FOREWORD

The publication of the Spring, 1969 edition of the University of Richmond Law Review imports considerations of a Janus-like significance. By marking the completion of the first volume of the Review, this issue ends the policy of publishing once a year and looks forward to the publication of two issues in 1969-70. Already, a great deal of thought and preparation have gone into next year's issues (total cost $5.00), both of which will honor the one hundredth anniversary of the T. C. Williams School of Law.

In order to prepare us financially for next year's publications, we have limited the size of the present issue, to save on operating and printing expenses. It will also be apparent to our readers that the amount of student material in this issue does not reach the proportions of last year's publication. This is mainly due to the draft and its related problems, which cut the size of the staff to a functioning minimum. We have learned to live with this problem but hope that it is only temporary.

With the completion of this publication, the last members of the staff who worked on the inaugural issue will graduate. Those of us who are leaving hope to have passed on the legacy left us by our predecessors, who dedicated the Review to excellence in legal scholarship. Even if this year we have not achieved this goal, we have the secure knowledge that the Review will always serve as a student forum for intellectual thought and a stimulus to legal education.
