The Power of Paradox: The Need for Alternative Remedies in Virginia Minority Shareholder Oppression Cases

Stephanie Martinez
University of Richmond

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarship.richmond.edu/law-student-publications

Part of the Business Organizations Law Commons

Recommended Citation

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the School of Law at UR Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Law Student Publications by an authorized administrator of UR Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact scholarshiprepository@richmond.edu.
UNIVERSITY OF RICHMOND
LAW REVIEW

VOLUME 49 2014–2015

EDITORIAL BOARD
TARA ANN BADAWY
Annual Survey Editor
D. PAUL HOLDSWORTH
Editor-in-Chief

SAMER ABADY
Executive Editor
DEREK SCHNITZER
Managing Editor

SHEHEREZADE C. MALIK
Annual Survey Editor
D. PAUL HOLDSWORTH
Editor-in-Chief

LEAH STIEGLER
Executive Editor
RINA VAN ORDEN
Lead Articles Editor

SARAH PADWAY
Senior Notes & Comments Editor

MANUSCRIPTS EDITORS

FRANCES CHRISTIAN
Jeffrey Miller
Scott Siegner

ARTICLES EDITORS

MOHAMMAD IMAAD
Adam Pratt
Amy Whitelaw

ARTICLES & COMMENTS EDITORS

NICHOLAS DANTONIO
Pietro Sanitate

SARAH BENNETT
Jill Foglyano

HANK FISHER
Sarah Rose

JEREMY BAKER

HANNAH EVANS
Kristina Ferris

DAVID BERRY

MALCOLM THOMAS

ALEXANDER BOYD

MAYME DONOHUE

AMY BRAUN

LAUREN MAEY
Jessica Swauger

LUKE BRESNAHAN

MADISON DUNERMANN

VICTORIA CHEKHYSKA

NICHOLAS DANTONIO

PHILLIP THOMAS DI STANISLAO

Pietro Sanitate

BARRY ENIX

JEREMY BAKER

SHANNAM FITZGERALD

DAVID BERRY

JACOB GLASSER

AMY BRAUN

JONATHAN HAIST

JOHN G. DOUGLASS

CARL W. TOBIAS

Faculty Advisors

JEREMY BAKER

JOHN JAY HAROOTUNIAN

DAVID BERRY

GORDON PHILLIPS

ALEXANDER BOYD

JOHN HOGAN

ANN ELIZABETH REID

AMY BRAUN

BENJAMIN JOHNSON

RICHARD KEGAN

JEREMY BAKER

CHRISTOPHER KEGAN

JEREMY BAKER

STEVEN LIEPMAN

JEREMY BAKER

SHAUN MACDONALD

JEREMY BAKER

REILLY MACDONALD

JEREMY BAKER

Carter Nichols

JEREMY BAKER

GLENICE B. COOMBS

JEREMY BAKER

UNIVERSITY OF RICHMOND LAW LIBRARY

DEC 03 2014
Editorial Policy

The University of Richmond Law Review seeks to preserve the author's writing style when editing articles selected for publication. Each author is given the opportunity to review his or her article prior to its publication.

Furthermore, the Law Review strives to promote an open and close working relationship with authors of articles selected for publication. To this end, the Law Review will maintain regular correspondence to update authors on the progress of their articles, as well as to resolve any problems that may occur during editing.

Submissions

The Law Review welcomes submissions year round on all legal topics. The Lead Articles Editor reviews each submission. The Lead Articles Editor and the Editor-in-Chief make offers of publication, taking into consideration quality and substance, among other factors.

University of Richmond Law Review
University of Richmond, Virginia 23173
Phone: (804) 289-8216
Fax: (804) 287-6438
E-mail: lawreview@richmond.edu
Please visit our website at:
http://lawreview.richmond.edu/
CONTENTS

ARTICLES

- Administrative Law ........................................... John Paul Jones
  John R. Mohrmann 1

- Civil Practice and Procedure ............................. Andrew P. Sherrod
  Jaime B. Wisegarver 27

- Criminal Law and Procedure .............................. Aaron J. Campbell 73

- Health Care Law ............................................... Sean P. Byrne
  Garrett Hooe 103

- Public Utilities Law ......................................... William T. Reisinger 137

- Taxation ............................................................ Craig D. Bell 171

- Wills, Trusts, and Estates ................................. J. William Gray, Jr.
  Katherine E. Ramsey 211

ESSAYS

- Appellate Law ................................................. The Honorable Marla Graff Decker 233

- A Recount of the Recount:
  Obenshain v. Herring ........... The Honorable Beverly Snukals
  Maggie Bowman 263

COMMENTS

- The Power Paradox: The Need for Alternative Remedies in Virginia Minority
  Shareholder Oppression Cases ............... Stephanie Martinez 287

- Virginia’s Gap Between Punishment and Culpability: Re-Examining Self-Defense
  Law and Battered Woman’s Syndrome .... Kendall Hamilton 327
INTRODUCTION

Without advanced planning, minority shareholders in a closely held corporation can find themselves in the unenviable position of being up a creek without a paddle. Minority shareholders often invest in a corporation with the belief that the investment will provide them with a steady stream of income, either from a job or from payment of dividends. Yet many fail to protect themselves with employment contracts or buy-sell agreements, leaving them vulnerable to a majority shareholder who may decide to fire them or withhold dividends. Without a source of income, a minority shareholder can face an indefinite period when there is no return on his or her investment.

To address this problem, many states, including Virginia, have enacted some form of the Model Business Corporation Act (the "MBCA"). The MBCA allows for involuntary dissolution of a corporation in certain circumstances.\(^6\) Dissolution, however, is considered a drastic remedy as it requires the corporation to enter into receivership and eventually be sold off.\(^7\) Because of this, courts are often hesitant to order dissolution except in cases of continued and egregious oppression. To address this problem, courts and legislatures in other jurisdictions have allowed equitable remedies, such as buy-outs or the appointment of a provisional director, in cases of minority shareholder oppression.\(^8\)

Although courts in other states have interpreted the MBCA's oppression provision as allowing equitable remedies,\(^6\) the Supreme Court of Virginia has ruled that Virginia's oppression statutory scheme provides only for the exclusive remedy of dissolution.\(^10\) Accordingly, it is up to the General Assembly to add equitable remedies. Virginia's corporation legislation likewise appear identical or very similar. Compare MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 14.30(a)(2)(b) (2007) (the MBCA's oppression subsection within its overall dissolution provision), with VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-747(A)(l)(b) (Repl. Vol. 2013 & Cum. Supp. 2013) (Virginia's oppression subsection within its overall dissolution provision).

Virginia's corporation legislation likewise appear identical or very similar. Compare MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 14.30 (2007). Those circumstances include:

[(1) where] the directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered, or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally, because of the deadlock; [(2)] the directors or those in control of the corporation have acted, are acting, or will act in a manner that is illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent; [(3)] the shareholders are deadlocked in voting power and have failed, for a period that includes at least two consecutive annual meeting dates, to elect successors to directors whose terms have expired.

\(^{11}\)

9. See Scott, 64 P.3d at 9; Fix, 538 S.W.2d at 357 n.3 (providing a detailed discussion of certain equitable remedies used in various jurisdictions).

10. Giannotti v. Hamway, 239 Va. 14, 28, 387 S.E.2d 725, 733 (1990); White v. Perkins, 213 Va. 129, 135, 189 S.E.2d 315, 320 (1972). The Supreme Court of Washington has interpreted the same statutory language, "a court . . . may dissolve a corporation," as allowing for equitable remedies up to and including dissolution. The Supreme Court of Virginia, on the other hand, has found the exact same language to only allow dissolution of a corporation and nothing more. Compare Scott, 64 P.3d at 9 (finding that alternative remedies are available in addition to dissolution), with Giannotti, 239 Va. at 28, 387 S.E.2d at 733 ("The remedy specified by the legislative while discretionary, is 'exclusive,' and does not permit the trial court to fashion other, apparently equitable remedies.").

11. The Virginia corporation oppression statute is written such that: "a court . . . may dissolve a corporation," as allowing for equitable remedies up to and including dissolution. The Virginia law can be interpreted as providing a non-exhaustive list of remedy choices and thereby allowing for equitable remedies, such as buy-outs or the appointment of a provisional director, in cases of minority shareholder oppression. Virginia's corporation legislation likewise appear identical or very similar. Compare MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 14.30(a)(2)(b) (2007) (the MBCA's oppression subsection within its overall dissolution provision), with VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-747(A)(l)(b) (Repl. Vol. 2013 & Cum. Supp. 2013) (Virginia's oppression subsection within its overall dissolution provision).

However, is corporation to enter. Because of this, except in cases of this problem, we allowed equipment of a provision.

Noted the MBCA’s remedies, the Virginia’s oppression remedy of dissonably to add equitable.

Model section within its overall provision. Include: of the corporate and irreparable business and advantage of the courts or those in a manner that is deadlock in that two consecutive terms have

1. The Virginia statute does provide one other option, a pre-trial buy-out; however, only the defendant or the corporation may elect to buy-out the plaintiff and end the case. See VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-749.1(c) (Cum. Supp. 2013).

2. See, e.g., Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 304.

3. Drastic Times, supra note 7. It should be noted that Virginia Code section § 13.1-747 is written such that oppression is addressed as a subsection within the overall dissolution statute. VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-747 (Repl. Vol. 2011 & Cum. Supp. 2013). Despite this construction, the oppression provision has become the thrust of the statute. For this reason, this article uses the term “oppression statute” when technically referencing the dissolution statute generally, of which oppression is addressed in a subsection.
presumption that a director of a corporation has discharged his duties "in accordance with his good faith business judgment of the best interests of the corporation." 14 While many states apply an objective standard to a director’s decisions in running a corporation, Virginia applies a subjective view of the director’s good faith business judgment. 15

Despite this highly deferential atmosphere, the recent Virginia case of Colgate v. Disthene Group shows that Virginia courts will not defer to a corporation’s directors in any and all circumstances. 16 Colgate involved a decades-long family dispute over the management of a kyanite mine and other operations, which collectively were worth millions. 17 The trial court held that the business judgment rule was inapplicable as it required directors to "actually exercise their good faith business judgment." Since the court found there was "no reason to believe that the management of Disthene will ever treat the Plaintiffs fairly," dissolution was the appropriate remedy. 18

This comment addresses where Virginia’s current scheme falls short and why equitable remedies are needed in Virginia minority shareholder oppression cases. Part I looks at how the MBCA attempted to solve the problem of minority shareholder oppression. Part II explores how other jurisdictions have interpreted or added to the MBCA so as to provide additional remedies in minority shareholder oppression cases. Finally, Part III advocates for adoption of a new dissolution statute in Virginia that includes equitable remedies for such cases.

15. Compare In re MPW Shareholders Litig., 67 A.3d 496, 500 (Del. Ch. 2013) (explaining Delaware’s business judgment rule is an objective standard: "Under [Delaware’s business judgment rule] the court is precluded from inquiring into the substantive fairness of [a director’s decision] ... unless [that decision was] so disparate that no rational person acting in good faith could have thought the [decision] was fair to the minority.") (emphasis added), with VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-690 (Repl. Vol. 2011 & Cum. Supp. 2013) (stating that courts consider whether a director fulfilled his duties in "accordance with his good faith business judgment") (emphasis added).
17. Id. at 287-88; see also Bill McKelway, Jurists Rejects Appeal of Firm’s Dissolution; Va. High Court Refuses Kyanite Company’s Bid to Overturn Liquidation, RICH. TIMES-DISPATCH, Feb. 17, 2013, at B01 (“In all, Disthene holdings are believed to be valued at some $200 million.”).
18. Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 294 (emphasis added).
19. Id. at 317.

A. The Problem

Minority shareholders with little or no control often find it an unenviable role, as their voices are silenced by majority shareholders. The Virginia court found there was "no reason to believe that the management of Disthene will ever treat the Plaintiffs fairly," dissolution was the appropriate remedy. This section de-
I. TREATMENT OF MINORITY SHAREHOLDERS UNDER THE MBCCA

The closely held corporate environment is particularly prone to abuse of minority shareholders who fail to protect themselves. These corporations are often started by friends or family members with little or no business experience. Furthermore, the initial shareholders often decide against consulting an attorney, finding it an unnecessary expense. In determining that minority shareholders should be protected from abuse, many states, including Virginia, have enacted the MBCCA. The MBCCA offers some protection to minority shareholders who might otherwise be stuck in the undesirable position of possessing stock without the means to profit therefrom. Virginia’s General Assembly has also gone one step further by enacting a pre-trial buy-out remedy, which allows the defendants or the corporation to buy-out the plaintiff’s ownership interest in the corporation prior to trial. This section describes the problems unique to closely held corporations and how Virginia’s current statutory scheme fails to adequately address those problems.

A. The Problem with Closely Held Corporations

Minority shareholders often invest in corporations with their family or friends. Many possess a useful skillset and plan to work for the corporation. Thus, many shareholders invest with the belief that their investment will lead to steady income, either from a job or from dividends. Minority shareholders often fail, however, to protect themselves before buying into a corporation.

20. See Thompson, supra note 1, at 702.
21. Id.; Molitor, supra note 2, at 491.
22. See Molitor, supra note 2, at 491-93.
24. See, e.g., FLA. STAT. § 607.0101 (2013); N.C. GEN. STAT. § 55-1-01 (2013); see also MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 1.01 (2007) (outlining the model provision language with which specific states may adopt the MBCCA).
27. See Molitor, supra note 2, at 491.
28. Thompson, supra note 1, at 702.
29. Id.
by not utilizing employment contracts or buy-sell agreements. Without any protection, minority shareholders are left susceptible to the decisions of the majority shareholder, who may decide to terminate the minority shareholder or reduce dividend payments. This lack of control can sometimes leave a minority shareholder facing an indefinite period of time where he is not earning any income back from his investment. Some minority shareholders, through no fault of their own, are even put in this position when they inherit their shares.

As an example of how a minority shareholder could invest in a corporation and fail to engage in the advanced planning necessary to protect himself, consider this hypothetical.

Individuals A, B, and C all friends, incorporate the ABC Corporation to make widgets. All three have an equal share in the corporation, each owning 33% of the stock. All three are also employed in various positions of the corporation. None of the owners bother to draft an employment agreement, nor do they agree to a buy-sell arrangement or any other protections prior to investing together. All three believe that, as equal owners, their status as employees is protected. After several successful years making widgets, with all three partners receiving respectable salaries and dividend payouts, personality and business conflicts arise that align A and B against C. In their capacity as a majority of the directors, A and B decide to fire C and cut dividend payments while increasing their own salaries. This leaves C with no protection, having been “frozen out” of a business that he helped create.

As is clear, a minority investor in a corporation is at the mercy of their decision-makers. If C loses control of his financial interest in the corporation and matters worse, C has no protection at ABC Corporation. In the event, with no other market in which to sell, C may bring a successful buyer to the sale of the business. If the corporation buys C's interest, but A and B will not purchase the corporation from C, and B's money is insufficient, then A and B may dissolve the business and be done.

As is clear, investors in a corporation are at the mercy of their decision-makers. Although central to corporate oppression, the relationship of personal relationships is also at play. If C, in the above situation, he would have been “frozen out.” 33

Although central to corporate oppression, the relationship of personal relationships is also at play. If C, in the above situation, he would have been “frozen out.” 33

30. See Douglas K. Moll, Minority Oppression & the Limited Liability Company: Learning (or Not) From Close Corporation History, 40 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 883, 912 (2005) (“Because close corporation owners are frequently linked by family or other personal relationships, there is often an initial atmosphere of mutual trust that diminishes the sense that contractual protection is needed.”); see also, Molitor, supra note 2, at 493, 496 (referring more generally to ways in which minority shareholders fail to protect themselves at the outset). Buy-sell agreements can be drafted numerous ways, but may include provisions addressing who can buy the stock, what price the stock will be sold for, and what events might trigger a buyout. See Robert W. Wood, In Business? Get a Buy-Sell Agreement!, FORBES.COM (Feb. 7, 2011, 9:07 AM), http://www.forbes.com/sites/robertwood/2011/02/07/in-business-get-a-buy-sell-agreement/.
31. Thompson, supra note 1, at 703.
32. Id.
33. The term “frozen out” essentially means being cut off from the business both in terms of decision making and profiting therefrom. It is commonly used to signal oppression in the closely held corporation context. See infra note 35.
With a minority interest, as long as A and B stay aligned in their decision-making, C has no way to force any change in the corporation and is left in the unenviable position of owning a financial interest with no return on his investment. To make matters worse, C has lost his primary source of income—employment at ABC Corporation. Finally, since this is a closely held corporation, with no shares listed on a public stock exchange, C has no market in which to sell his interest. Looking forward, were C to bring a successful claim for oppression, the only remedy currently available to the court is dissolution of the corporation—a forced sale of the business. Of course, A and B could step the corporation back, which would essentially amount to a C's interest, but only if A and B have enough liquid assets to purchase the corporation or secure a loan for the purchase. If both A and B's money is tied up in ABC Corporation, as is often the case, then A and B might not be able to come up with the funds, and the business could be purchased by someone else.

As is clear from the hypothetical above, minority shareholders invest in a corporation with high hopes and big dreams. Minority shareholders often do not stop to consider relationships sour and, instead, rely on the idea that their personal relationships with the other investors will survive, and hopefully even thrive, in the business world.\textsuperscript{34} In many cases, however, the pressure of making business decisions can cause rifts in those relationships that eventually lead to the “freezing out”\textsuperscript{35} of one, or possibly more, of the minority shareholders.

If C, in the above hypothetical, considered suing for dissolution, he would have to lay out exactly how A and B acted oppressively. Although central to determining whether or not dissolution is appropriate, the MBCA and many state statutes fail to define oppression. Instead, state courts have stepped in to provide a definition. The Supreme Court of Virginia opined in \textit{White v. Perkins} that oppression is “a visible departure from the standards of fair dealing, and a violation of fair play on which every shareholder \textsuperscript{34} See Moll, supra note 30, at 912.

\textsuperscript{35} Id. at 889–90. “Standard freeze-out techniques include the refusal to declare dividends, the termination of a minority shareholder’s employment, the removal of a minority shareholder from a position of management, and the siphoning off of corporate earnings through high compensation to the majority shareholder, quite often, these tactics are used in combination.” Id.
who entrusts his money to a company is entitled to rely." The Supreme Court of South Carolina has listed several relevant factors in finding a violation of fair dealing or fair play, including: "exclusion from management, withholding of dividends, paying excessive salaries to majority shareholders, and analogous activities." Other factors courts have considered include abusive conduct, recurring breaches of fiduciary duty, or frustration of a shareholder's reasonable expectations.

B. Virginia's Enactment of the MBCA's Oppression Provision

Virginia adopted the MBCA in 1956. Under the MBCA, a court may order a corporation dissolved in certain specific, exclusive circumstances. One of those circumstances is when the directors, or those in control, have "acted, are acting, or will act in a manner that is illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent." The law is specific about remedies available to the court, stating that a trial court may dissolve a corporation if the plaintiff establishes that one of the circumstances has been met. The statute does not expressly allow for any other remedy, and Virginia courts have interpreted Virginia's version of the MBCA as providing for only one remedy, dissolution, in an oppression case.

37. See Kiriakides v. Atlas Food Sys. & Servs., Inc., 541 S.E.2d 257, 266 n.25 (S.C. 2001); see also Mary Siegel, Fiduciary Duty Myths in Close Corporate Law, 29 DEL. J. CORP. L. 377, 386-87 (2004) (noting that most state statutes allowing for dissolution due to oppression fail to define oppression, leaving the courts to supply a definition).
38. See Siegel, supra note 37, at 387.
   (1) the directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered, or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally, because of the deadlock; or (2) the shareholders are deadlocked in voting power and have failed, for a period that includes at least two consecutive annual meeting dates, to elect successors to directors whose terms have expired.

The Supreme Court of Virginia first considered the issue of whether the MBCA provided for equitable remedies in White v. Perkins. In White, the plaintiff and the defendant formed a corporation with the defendant as the controlling shareholder. The corporation, at the insistence of the defendant, never declared or paid dividends. Because the plaintiff was required to pay income taxes on money that he was not receiving, he became "financially pressed." Despite his awareness of the plaintiff's financial situation, the defendant still refused to declare or pay dividends or, alternatively, agree to a buy-out of either his stock or the plaintiff's stock.

The trial court found that the defendant majority shareholder oppressed the plaintiff minority shareholder and ordered the corporation to declare and pay dividends, as well as other remedies.

On appeal, the supreme court held that, while the trial court could have ordered the dissolution of the corporation, the court could not, under the statute, order any alternative remedies. In determining that dissolution was the only statutorily available option, the court stated that Virginia's oppression provision "clearly shows an intent by the General Assembly that the alternatives provided there are exclusive rather than inclusive." Thus, the court in an oppression case is faced with the choice of either dissolving the corporation or dismissing the case.

---

44. Id.
45. Id. at 131, 189 S.E.2d at 317.
46. Id., 189 S.E.2d at 318.
47. Id. at 131–32, 189 S.E.2d at 318.
48. Id.
49. Id. at 130, 189 S.E.2d at 317.
50. Id. at 135, 189 S.E.2d at 320. It should be noted that in White, the court did state that it clearly could have appointed a custodian with power to continue the business. Id. It is likely that the White court was alluding to the remedy currently codified at Virginia Code section 13.1-748(A) which permits a court to appoint a custodian to manage the corporation "while the proceeding is pending." VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-748(A) (Repl. Vol. 2011) (emphasis added). This, however, is a temporary appointment only. Thus when reading the appointment language in White, one should place his or her emphasis on the exclusivity of dissolution. It is White 's holding that the alternatives to dissolution are exclusive, not inclusive.
52. See id. Again, while the White court seemed to indicate that there might be another available alternative (i.e., appointing a custodian to continue the business), this lan-
In finding that dissolution was the only available remedy, the Supreme Court of Virginia did not elaborate as to why it reached this conclusion, except for implying that the conclusion was obvious from the statutory language. Along with this textual analysis, the court may have based its opinion on other considerations, including the knowledge that minority shareholders are often-times able to pursue other causes of actions that provide alternative remedies, and the idea that courts should promote the use of contracts to protect minority shareholders before a business deal is finalized, as opposed to courts providing the sole protection. Subsequent Virginia opinions have followed the White court in finding that dissolution is the only remedy available to a trial court in oppression cases. In Giannotti v. Hamway, the court held that "[t]he remedy specified by the legislature [dissolution], while discretionary, is 'exclusive' and does not permit the trial court to fashion other, apparently equitable remedies." In short, White and other courts have narrowly construed the remedies available for cases of shareholder oppression. Under the current scheme, dissolution is wholly favored over the recognition of other equitable remedies.

C. Virginia's Pre-Trial Buyout Option

Following several decades where the only option in oppression cases was dissolution, the General Assembly enacted a statute that allows for a pre-trial buyout. Under Virginia Code section 13.1-749.1, a court may elect to buy out a shareholder, however, if a shareholder is dissatisfied with the dissolution, they may appeal the court's decision. In addition, the court may also order the corporation to pay the shareholder's attorney fees and costs associated with the appeal. The tools of good corporate practice are designed to give a purchasing minority stockholder the opportunity to bargain for protection before parting with consideration. It would do violence to normal corporate practice and our corporate law to fashion an ad hoc ruling which would result in a court-imposed stockholder buy-out for which the parties had not contracted. However, minority shareholders who inherit their shares do not have this opportunity.

53. White, 213 Va. at 135, 189 S.E.2d at 320.
54. For example, a minority shareholder could bring a breach of fiduciary duty claim.
55. In most cases, minority shareholders can protect themselves by entering into employment agreements, buy-sell agreements, and other contracts prior to investing in a corporation. See, e.g., Nixon v. Blackwell, 626 A.2d 1365, 1379–80 (Del. 1993).
57. Id., at 387 S.E.2d at 733.
NEED FOR ALTERNATIVE REMEDIES

13.1-749.1, a corporation or a shareholder in the corporation, can elect to buy the shares of the complaining shareholder.68 An election, however, must be made within ninety days of the filing of a suit for dissolution, or "at such later time as the court in its discretion may allow."69 The election must be done prior to trial, as once the election is made, a fair value of the shares will be determined either by agreement among the parties or, if they are unable to agree, by the court.66 An election is "irrevocable unless the court determines that it is equitable to set aside or modify the election."70 After the fair value of the shares is determined, the court must enter an order directing the purchase of the shares, and may also award the petitioning shareholder reasonable attorney fees and expert fees if the court determines that the petitioner’s claims under section 13.1-747 were meritorious.71 Further, once a buy-out order is entered, the court must dismiss the petition to dissolve, and the petitioning shareholder “no longer has any rights or status as a shareholder of the corporation, except the right to receive the amounts awarded to him by the order of the court.”72

The buy-out alternative was enacted to provide a "less Draconian remedy" in cases of shareholder conflict, while at the same time ensuring that no shareholder had a tactical advantage over the other shareholders.64 With the possibility of a pre-trial buy-out, a shareholder interested in pursuing dissolution now must consider the potential exposure that he risks to a pre-trial buy-out.65 As one trial court observed, "[i]t is perhaps an unintended result of the statute that a plaintiff who originally sought to dissolve a corporation ends up in a proceeding to establish value provides for no formal discovery."66 Thus, pursuing dissolution might lead to a forced sale in a proceeding where the plaintiff

64. See id.
does not have formal access to discovery and may be left with an agreement that contains unfavorable terms.

D. Colgate v. Disthene Group

Since the enactment of the pre-trial buyout, Virginia has only seen two cases involving minority shareholder oppression go to trial. The most recent case, Colgate v. Disthene Group, involved two sides of a family fighting over the management of a prosperous business in Buckingham County. As one local news reporter summarized, this case "redefined Virginia business law, [and] exposed the withering business practices of a generations-old family mining and landholding concern."

The Colgate case focused on the complicated and dramatic relationships between the descendants of Guy Dixon, who first bought a kyanite mine at a bankruptcy sale in 1945. After Dixon's death, one side of the family inherited a majority of the shares, including all of the voting stock, while the other side inherited a minority share of all non-voting stock. Following several years of low dividend payments and evidence of "exorbitant" salaries, the minority shareholders filed suit against the majority shareholders. The minority shareholders alleged, among other allegations, that they were being oppressed, accusing the majority shareholders of authorizing large bonuses while cutting dividends. The minority shareholders sought dissolution of the Disthene Group.

67. Goolsby & Heuhsen, supra note 64, at 194.
68. Id.; Cattano v. Bragg, centered on whether a minority shareholder could simultaneously bring a derivative suit and an individual action for judicial dissolution. 283 Va. 638, 643, 727 S.E.2d 625, 626 (2012).
71. Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 287.
72. Id. at 288.
73. Id.
74. Id. at 289.
75. Id.
76. Id.
77. Id. at 285, 287.
78. Id. at 296.
79. Id. at 297.
80. Id. at 316-17.
81. Id. at 317.
82. Drastic Timo, June 11, 2013.
83. Id.
The trial court found that several of the actions taken by the majority shareholders were oppressive and "visibly depart[ed] from the standards of fair dealing." The court first determined that the majority shareholders purposely withheld dividend payments as retaliation for previous trust litigation pursued by the minority shareholders. The court further found that the majority shareholders awarded themselves "enormous pay raises and even larger bonuses" during the same period of time. In its conclusion, the court stated that the minority shareholders had been treated as irksome interlopers, problems to be dealt with, preferably by squeezing them out at a below market price, or slashing their dividends in the hope of depriving them of the financial wherewithal to seek legal recourse. The trial court then held that dissolution was appropriate and ordered the Disthene Group dissolved.

Following the trial court’s order of dissolution, this case was considered a potential “turning point in Virginia’s judicial approach to the rights and protections of minority shareholders.” The plaintiffs’ expert witness opined that the holding would “help bolster minority shareholder investment in Virginia companies because of the protections the decision carries for minority shareholders.” The parties ultimately settled, wherein the defendants agreed to buy out the plaintiffs for $70 million, after an appeal to the Supreme Court of Virginia was eventually granted.

Another Virginia case involving possible oppression is currently working its way through the courts. The case involves the beloved Virginia landmark, Luray Caverns, owned by the Graves

---

77. Id. at 295, 298.
78. Id. at 296.
79. Id. at 297.
80. Id. at 316–17.
81. Id. at 317.
82. Drastic Times, supra note 7.
83. Id.
84. Bill McKelway, Kyanite Mining Case Finally Comes to a Close, RICH. TIMES-DISPATCH, June 11, 2013, at B1.
85. The Supreme Court of Virginia denied the first appeal request. The defendants then petitioned for a rehearing, which was granted by the supreme court. See Bill McKelway, Kyanite Mining Case Going to Virginia Supreme Court, RICH. TIMES-DISPATCH (June 10, 2013, 12:00 AM), http://www.timesdispatch.com/news/kyanite-mining-case-going-to-virginia-supreme-court/article_d5e577ca-a1a5-51f6-80e1-6e575350ce28.html [hereinafter McKelway, Mining Case Going to Virginia Supreme Court].
family and worth approximately $20 million. Prior to the death of their parents, there were several internal disputes among the six siblings over who should run the caverns and who should be trustee for the family's multiple trusts. The fighting exploded into multiple lawsuits over the last several decades, with accusations against one sibling for creating "golden parachutes" for herself and two of her brothers, and against that same sibling for acting "imperial" when she managed the caverns and freezing out another brother from all decision-making.

Although the Luray case is still pending, the Colgate decision has important implications for how the case may turn out. With what appears to be a similar fact pattern, including one side of the family controlling the business and providing themselves with excessive monetary benefit, it is quite possible that any trial alleging oppression could result in dissolution. Even without the Supreme Court of Virginia ultimately deciding the Colgate case, the combination of the trial court's decision and the high settlement in Colgate may provide the Luray defendants with additional incentive to settle any case alleging oppression to avoid risking dissolution.

Virginia's statutory scheme currently offers only limited remedies in minority shareholder oppression cases. A plaintiff can attempt to negotiate an informal resolution with the majority shareholders or sue for dissolution. After suit has been filed, the corporation or other shareholders have the option to buy-out the plaintiff. Once the case gets to trial, however, the only remedy available to the plaintiff is dissolution.

II. LESSONS FROM COLGATE

A majority of states, following Missouri, have adopted a provision for an oppressed minority shareholder to bring an oppression claim against the majority shareholders by fiduciary duty or against the business itself. Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, among others, have statutes that allow minority shareholders to bring an oppression claim against the corporation. The law in these states that allow an oppression claim against the corporation that holds a majority of voting stock is not identical to the Virginia law. In Missouri, the claim is for an oppression of the minority shareholders against the corporation and the plaintiff may seek a court order to dissolve the corporation. By contrast, Virginia law is more limited and allows only a claim against the corporation’s directors or managers to dissolve the corporation. However, Virginia law is unique among the states that allow an oppression claim against the corporation in that it is only available to an oppressed minority shareholder who has suffered an actual injury.

A. Requiring Nevada and Delaware to Follow Missouri’s Example

Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Illinois have not adopted the Missouri test for an oppression claim. This is not because of action taken by the state's legislatures, but because the Supreme Court of Delaware has held that Delaware law does not require a finding of "oppression or wrong" before a preliminary or permanent injunction can be entered in an oppression case. The Delaware court reasoned that a finding of "oppression or wrong" is inherently in all oppression cases.

94. See infra P. 300.
95. MODEL BUS. GROWTH & ENT. CODE § 9.31; see also supra P. 300.
96. Scott v. Tr. for the Estate of Blount, 805 I.L.L. 538 S.W.2d 351, 352 (Ill. 1980).
97. See id.; Scott v. Tr. for the Estate of Blount, supra note 96.
98. Siegel, supra P. 300.
available to the judge is dissolution. Recognizing the limitations inherent in the MBCA's oppression provision, other jurisdictions have expanded the remedies available to courts in oppression cases.

II. LESSONS LEARNED FROM REMEDIES AVAILABLE IN OTHER JURISDICTIONS

A majority of states have enacted the MBCA, which provides for an oppression cause of action. Delaware, however, has decided against allowing oppression causes of action, instead finding that minority shareholders in such circumstances are protected by fiduciary duty requirements. Of those states that allow oppression cases, many have allowed additional remedies besides dissolution. Courts in some states, such as Washington and Missouri, have interpreted the oppression provision in the MBCA as granting a wide range of remedies. Legislatures in other states, such as Illinois, have explicitly added alternative remedies to their statutes. Virginia should follow the lead of other MBCA states that allow equitable remedies in oppression cases.

A. Requiring Minority Shareholders to Protect Themselves on the Front End

Delaware, the "pre-eminient jurisdiction in corporate law," has not adopted the MBCA. Instead, Delaware case law provides for a cause of action based on breach of fiduciary duties owed to minority shareholders by majority shareholders but does not recognize 94. See infra Part II.

95. MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT §§ 1.01, 14.30 (2007); Haynsworth, supra note 5, at 33 n.31; see also supra note 5 (for more discussion on the adoption of the MBCA and its oppression provision).

97. 805 ILL. COMP. STAT. 5/12.50(b) (2013) ("As an alternative to dissolution, the court may order any of the other remedies contained in subsection (b) of Section 12.55" (referring to the remedies of appointing a custodian to manage the business or the appointing of a provisional director to serve for a particular term under court-prescribed terms)).

98. Siegel, supra note 37, at 378.
an oppression cause of action. Although an oppression claim was once heard by a Delaware Chancery Court judge in Litle v. Waters, the Supreme Court of Delaware quickly overruled this opinion and elucidated that minority shareholders of closely held corporations in Delaware could not bring a case alleging oppression.\(^\text{99}\)

Litle was the first Delaware case to recognize a separate cause of action for oppression by minority shareholders and some found the opinion surprising.\(^\text{100}\) The idea that oppression could be a separate cause of action under Delaware common law was short-lived. In 1993, one year after the Litle opinion was announced, a different chancery court judge stated: "I do not read Litle as establishing an independent cause of action for 'oppressive abuse of discretion' distinct from a cause of action based on a breach of fiduciary duty."\(^\text{102}\) This line of reasoning was similarly adopted by the Delaware Supreme Court, which held in Nixon v. Blackwell that there was no separate cause of action based on oppression.\(^\text{103}\)

In Nixon, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants attempted to force a sale of the plaintiff's stock back to the corporation by cutting dividends and breached "their fiduciary duties by authorizing excessive compensation for themselves and other employees," among other allegations.\(^\text{104}\) The trial court ordered a buy-out of the plaintiffs' stock.\(^\text{105}\) On appeal, the Supreme Court of Delaware reversed, finding that the trial court's judgment went against the "well established ... jurisprudence that stockholders need not always be treated equally for all purposes."\(^\text{106}\) In so holding, the court found it significant that the plaintiffs were neither employees of the corporation nor were they "protected by specific provisions in the certificate of incorporation, by-laws, or a shareholders' agreement."\(^\text{107}\) Further, the court went on to state that if

---

\(^101\) Id.
\(^103\) Nixon, 626 A.2d at 1379–80.
\(^104\) Id. at 1373.
\(^105\) Id. at 1373–74.
\(^106\) Id. at 1376.
\(^107\) Id. at 1377.
sion claim was in *Little v. Wa­tuled this opin­ seemingly held cor­ case alleging

3eparate cause

nd some found

would be a sep­

aw was short­

announced, a

Litle

m­

abuse of a breach of fi­ dly adopted by

v. Blackwell oppression.

nts attempted

ies by authored a buy-out

Court of Dela­

went stockholders

In so hold­ were neither stated by specific was “in the abstract” only, as any stock purchaser in reality could bargain for more control and more rights before purchasing the stock. In so doing, the stock purchaser “make[s] a business judgment whether to buy into such a minority position, and if so on what terms.” The stock purchaser further has the ability to protect himself on the front-end by entering into stockholder agreements that “provide for elaborate earnings tests, buy-out provisions, voting trusts, or other voting agreements.”

The Nixon court found that “[t]he tools of good corporate practice are designed to give a purchasing minority stockholder the opportuniity to bargain for protection before parting with consideration.”

Finally, the court held that “[i]t would do violence to normal corporate practice and our corporation law to fashion an ad hoc ruling which would result in a court-imposed stockholder buy-out for which the parties had not contracted.”

In disallowing shareholder oppression actions, the Nixon court clearly believed that Delaware law provides sufficient protection for minority shareholders through the courts’ commitment to enforcing fiduciary duties. Delaware courts still “critically exam­

108. Id.

109. Id. at 1379.

110. Id. at 1379–80.

111. Id.

112. Id. at 1380.

113. Id. (emphasis added).

114. Id.

115. Id. at 1379–81 (“It would run counter to the spirit of the doctrine of independent legal significance . . . for this Court to fashion a special judicially-created rule for minority investors . . . .”; see also Siegel, supra note 37, at 404 (“Subsequently, the Delaware Supreme Court in Nixon confirmed . . . that there is no separate cause of action for oppression or for frustration of reasonable expectations.”). By discouraging litigation, Delaware ine otherwise ordinary decisions that were, in reality, designed to starve out the minority shareholder." Thus, "while shareholders in [Delaware] will not have their reasonable expectations or mere preferences satisfied, it is a gross exaggeration to assume that courts in these states would permit these shareholders to be abused." However, given that Delaware's entire fairness standard does not require equality, there is still the possibility that a financial freeze-out may result, or alternatively, may be allowed to persist due to a court's hesitancy to find oppression under the doctrine of entire fairness.118

Although front-end protection through contract is ideal, and should be encouraged by the courts, simply expecting a minority shareholder to protect himself upfront ignores the reality of who most minority shareholders are and what information is available to them prior to purchasing a minority interest in a corporation. First, those involved in a closely held corporation are frequently friends or family members. These personal relationships help create an initial atmosphere of mutual trust that diminishes the sense that contractual protection is needed.121 To correct this courts may also be trying to prevent the significant corporate turmoil that accompanies litigation. As one commentator noted, "[t]raditional litigation of such shareholder disputes may be the legal equivalent of killing the goose that lays the golden egg." Susan Marmande, A Statutory Escape Route: Shareholder Disputes, 70 OR. ST. BULL. 36, 36 (2010). In such circumstances, "[b]y the time the parties' rights are finally adjudicated, the company may be damaged beyond repair; working relationships are destroyed; legal fees and costs are crushing; and key employees are distracted from attending to the needs of the enterprise and its customers." Id.

116. Siegel, supra note 37, at 453.
117. Id. at 457.
118. See Nixon, 626 A.2d at 1381. The entire fairness standard requires two things: fair dealing and a fair pricing.

The former embraces questions of when the transaction was timed, how it was initiated, structured, negotiated, disclosed to the directors, and how the approvals of the directors and the stockholders were obtained. The latter aspect of fairness relates to the economic and financial considerations of the proposed merger, including all relevant factors: assets, market value, earnings, future prospects, and any other elements that affect the intrinsic or inherent value of a company's stock.

Id. at 1376 (quoting Weinberger v. UOP, Inc., 457 A.2d 701, 711 (Del. 1983)). Although entire fairness is a more stringent standard than the deferential business judgment rule, it does not require shareholders to be treated equally, as made clear by the Nixon court.

Id.

119. See Moll, supra note 30, at 912.
120. Id.
121. Id.
mentality, states could enact legislation that would require owners of limited liability companies and corporations to read warnings about the risks of starting a business or “purchasing an equity interest in an existing closely-held [corporation]” without advanced planning. Increasing the educational opportunities available to owners would increase the likelihood of advance planning, and subsequently provide for better protection of a minority shareholder’s interests.

B. Interpreting the Oppression Provision as Expansive and Allowing Alternative Remedies

Courts in other jurisdictions that have enacted the MBCA, including Washington and Missouri, have interpreted their statutes to allow for remedies up to and including dissolution in minority shareholder oppression cases. The Supreme Court of Washington and the Missouri Court of Appeals have both held that the MBCA does not limit a court’s equitable power.

1. Washington

In Scott v. Trans-System, Inc., the Supreme Court of Washington held that the MBCA’s oppression provision allows for equitable remedies other than dissolution. The plaintiff in Scott filed suit against the defendant alleging, among other things, oppression and misapplication or waste of corporate assets.

122. Molitor, supra note 2, at 496.
123. Id. at 581, 585. Again, however, one must consider the mentality of an unsophisticated shareholder starting a corporation (who might breeze through any reading material provided him by the state) and those shareholders who inherited their interest in the corporation.
126. Scott, 64 P.3d at 9–10.
127. Id. at 4.
tiff requested dissolution, which the trial court granted.\(^{128}\) The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed the decision, finding no abuse of discretion by the trial court.\(^{129}\) The Supreme Court of Washington reversed the order of dissolution, holding that the evidence presented in support of dissolution was not sufficient for such a drastic remedy when other, less drastic remedies could have been ordered by the trial court and were appropriate under the circumstances.\(^{130}\)

Washington's oppression statute, just like Virginia's, states that a trial court may dissolve a corporation if there is oppression.\(^{131}\) In determining that the statute allowed for remedies other than oppression, the Supreme Court of Washington reasoned that dissolution suits were "fundamentally equitable in nature."\(^{132}\) Rellying on this conclusion, the court reasoned that trial courts faced with an oppression case could consider alternative equitable remedies.\(^{133}\) Those remedies included: (1) an entry of an order requiring dissolution at a future date if the shareholders could not come to an agreement; (2) appointment of a receiver to run the affairs of the corporation; and (3) "an award of damages to [the] minority shareholders ... for any injury suffered by them."\(^{134}\) The Scott court further found that "[d]issolution should not be granted as a matter of right, since the provision allowing judicial dissolution is 'clearly couched in language of permission.'"\(^{135}\) Thus, while Washington's oppression statute "grants ... courts discretion to dissolve a corporation when those in control of the corporation are acting oppressively," the courts should not exercise such discretion unless "a remedy as severe as involuntary dissolution" is necessary given the circumstances.

2. Missouri

The Missouri Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's decision, finding that the record showed that the minority shareholders were entitled to at least an order requiring dissolution at a future date, an order compelling the corporation to liquidate, and an award of damages to the minority shareholders for any injury suffered by them. The court further noted that, under Missouri law, a court has the discretion to dissolve a corporation when those in control of the corporation are acting oppressively, and that the record showed that the corporation was not acting in the best interests of the minority shareholders.

In an earlier case, the Missouri Court of Appeals held that a previous verdict in favor of the minority shareholders for breach of fiduciary duty was insufficient to justify the dissolution of the corporation.\(^{136-143}\)

\(^{128}\) Id.
\(^{129}\) Id.
\(^{130}\) Id. at 10.
\(^{132}\) Scott, 64 P.3d at 9.
\(^{133}\) Id. (citing Fix v. Fix Material Co., 538 S.W.2d 351, 357 (Mo. Ct. App. 1976)).
\(^{134}\) Id. (quoting Baker v. Commercial Body Builders, Inc., 607 P.2d 387, 395–96 (Or. 1973)).
\(^{135}\) Id. at 5 (quoting Henry George & Sons, Inc. v. Cooper-George, Inc., 632 P.2d 512, 516 (Wash. 1981)).
\(^{136}\) Id. at 10.
\(^{138}\) Fix, 538 S.W.2d at 354.
\(^{139}\) Id. at 356.
\(^{140}\) Id. at 356, 357.
\(^{141}\) Id. at 361.
\(^{142}\) Id. at 357, 358.
\(^{143}\) Kirtz v. Great River Paper Co., 810 S.W.2d 195059 (Mo. Ct. App. 2005 WL 195059 (Mo. Ct. App. 2005)).
The Missouri Court of Appeals has also held that dissolution is not an exclusive remedy under the MBCA. In Fix v. Fix Material Co., the plaintiff sued under Missouri’s Business Corporation Act, seeking dissolution of the closely held corporation in which she was a minority shareholder due to oppressive conduct by those in control. The plaintiff presented evidence of long-term employment contracts that the defendants awarded themselves as well as salary increases given to the defendants during years when the company suffered net losses. Although the court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants, it held that the defendants’ actions were “narrowly close” to oppression, and that a future suit the plaintiff might be successful if the defendant’s course of action failed to change. The Fix court ruled if a future suit was brought, the trial court had the power to order a variety of equitable remedies, including payment of damages, declaration of a dividend, buy-out of a minority shareholder’s stocks, and, if warranted, dissolution.

In an earlier decision, the Missouri Court of Appeals found that a previous version of the oppression statute, which allowed for liquidation of a corporation when the majority stockholders acted oppressively, was permissive in nature, and the courts were “not restricted to that remedy.” Thus, both the Supreme Court of

136. Id. at 10.
138. Fix, 538 S.W.2d at 356-57.
139. Id. at 354.
140. Id. at 356, 359.
141. Id. at 361.
142. Id. at 357 n.3 (quoting Baker v. Commercial Body Builders, Inc., 507 P.2d 387, 395-96 (Or. 1973)).
143. Kirtz v. Grossman, 463 S.W.2d 541, 545 (Mo. Ct. App. 1971). This liquidation statute has since been replaced by Missouri’s adoption of the MBCA’s oppression provi-
Washington and the Missouri Court of Appeals have found that the very language of the MBCA oppression provision allows for equitable remedies on its face, with no need to modify the statute to explicitly add additional remedies. Other state courts have ruled similarly and allowed equitable remedies despite dissolution being the only remedy expressly available under the statute.

C. Adding a Non-Exhaustive List of Remedies to the Oppression Statute

Other jurisdictions have modified the MBCA's oppression provision to include a list of equitable remedies that the trial courts can consider as an alternative to dissolution. To further illustrate this point, three states will serve as examples. First, New Jersey has added a list of remedies for use in oppression cases where the corporation has twenty-five or less shareholders. Second, Illinois has added a non-exhaustive list of potential remedies available in all oppression cases. Finally, Oregon has added a non-exhaustive list of equitable remedies that is very similar to Illinois' statute.

1. New Jersey

New Jersey's legislature added a list of remedies to its oppression statute, allowing a custodian, appointed by the court, to exercise all of the powers of the corporation's directors and to vote the corporation's stock, with the best interest of the corporation in mind. The custodian may then exercise his discretion as to whether to sell or to liquidate the corporation, and to pursue any other equitable remedies available in cases of oppression.

The Supreme Court of New Jersey's opinion pointed by a difficult question: to whom should directors turn in a case where shareholders have been wronged but are not to provide remedies against the wrongdoers? Authorities on

150. [Ref.]
151. [Ref.]
152. [Ref.]
153. [Ref.]
154. [Ref.]
156. [Ref.]
157. Id. at 10

have found that oppression allows for the courts to modify the statute despite dissolution under the statute.

1. New Jersey

New Jersey is one of the few states where the state legislature added a list of alternative remedies to the MBCA. Under New Jersey’s statute, the trial court has the authority to “appoint a custodian, appoint a provisional director, order a sale of the corporation’s stock . . . , or enter a judgment dissolving the corporation . . . ” Pursuant to the statute, a provisional director appointed by a court would have all the authority and power of an elected director of the corporation, “including the right to notice of and to vote at meetings.” Further, a custodian is given even more power . . . . A custodian appointed by the court may “exercise all of the powers of the corporation’s board and officers to the extent necessary to manage the affairs of the corporation in the best interests of its shareholders and creditors . . . ,” subject only to court-imposed limitations. New Jersey’s statute makes clear that remedies for minority shareholder oppression are only available in cases where the corporation has twenty-five or less shareholders.

The Supreme Court of New Jersey has interpreted New Jersey’s oppression provision as responding “at least in part, to the fact that traditional principles of corporate law were often unsuccessful at curbing abuses of power by majority interests in closely-held corporations.” The addition of alternative remedies was accordingly meant to “increase[e] the willingness of courts to intervene and provide relief to shareholders.” Although expected to even the balance of power, the Brenner v. Berkowitz court cautioned that the statute was “meant only to protect the minority, not to provide a weapon to enable it to obtain unfair advantage against the majority.” Finally, while a review of the relevant authorities does not overtly shed light on why the New Jersey leg-

151. Id. § 14A:12-7(3).
152. See id. § 14A:12-7(c).
153. Id. (emphasis added).
154. Id. § 14A:12-7(1)(c).
156. Id. at 1030.
157. Id. at 1030 (quoting Lawrence E. Mitchell, The Death of Fiduciary Duty in Close Corporations, 138 U. PA. L. REV. 1675, 1730 (1990)).
I legislature limited the availability of alternative remedies in oppression cases to corporations with twenty-five or less shareholders, it is plausible that this limitation is meant to recognize the fact that the most vulnerable shareholders are usually those who start, or enter into, corporations with family and friends that are generally small and have only a few shareholders.

2. Illinois

Illinois is another state where the legislature added additional remedies other than dissolution in cases of minority shareholder oppression. 158 Under Illinois’ Business Corporation Act, the trial court can order a variety of remedies in oppression cases, including removal from office of an officer or director, payment of dividends, award of damages, and a buy-out. 159 Dissolution may also be ordered, but only if the court determines that any alternative remedy would be insufficient. 160 The statute goes on to state that the listed remedies are not exclusive. 161 Accordingly, Illinois’ legislature has cloaked Illinois courts with broad discretionary power to order appropriate remedies in minority shareholder oppression cases.

Illinois’ General Assembly adopted its oppression statute, along with the list of remedies, in response to the Illinois’ courts aversion toward granting relief in cases where “shareholder relationships broke down.” 162 This aversion led some “shareholders to resort to ‘self-help’ measures,” such as establishing a competing business, that were “injurious both to themselves and the corporation.” 163 Further, in interpreting the policy behind Illinois’ oppression statute, the Supreme Court of Illinois stated that the alternative remedies were “specified enacted to ... increase[e] the remedies available to minority shareholders and ... enlarg[e] the 159. Id. §§ 5/12.56(b)(3), (b)(9)–(11).

160. Id. § 5/12.56(b)(12).
161. Id. § 5/12.56(c).
163. Id. For example, in Hagenskas v. Gaylord, the plaintiff, following the court’s refusal to intervene in a case involving deadlock, established a competing business and began poaching employees from the defendant’s business. 557 N.E.2d 316, 318–20 (Ill. App. Ct. 1990).
NEED FOR ALTERNATIVE REMEDIERS

discretionary authority of the circuit courts to award relief in situations which do not warrant dissolution but which do warrant some other, less severe remedy.

Finally, in support of Illinois' alternative remedy statute, one commentator argued:

[given the infinite number of ways that business partners can oppress each other, the Illinois statutory scheme is effective because it is flexible enough to preserve the assets of the corporation, and because, at the same time, it provides the disputing parties with a framework that allows them to work out their differences.]

Thus, Illinois' scheme provides a much more flexible framework for oppression cases than does Virginia's.

3. Oregon

Finally, Oregon's statute is very similar to Illinois' oppression statute. Oregon's oppression statute provides courts with a non-exhaustive list of equitable remedies that courts can order. These remedies include alteration of the corporation's articles of incorporation or bylaws, the removal from office of any director or officer, the appointment of an individual as a director or officer, or the award of damages to an aggrieved party.

Oregon's statute further instructs the court that dissolution is only appropriate "if the court determines that no remedy specified in the [preceding subsections] or other alternative remedy is sufficient to resolve 164. Schirmer v. Bear, 672 N.E.2d 1171, 1176 (Ill. 1996). Although the court concentrated on the alternative remedy statute for public corporations, the court found that its statutory construction "comports with the current statutory scheme regulating shareholder remedies for nonpublic corporations." Id. The court further noted that the addition of these alternative remedies was a direct response to earlier Illinois court decisions holding that a shareholder in a public corporation could not be granted an alternative remedy unless the defendant's conduct rose to a level that justified dissolution. Id. at 1175-76; see also 805 ILL. COMP. STAT. 5/12.55 (2012) (listing remedies available to a shareholder in a public corporation who is alleging oppression by controlling shareholders).

165. Quinlan & Kennedy, supra note 162, at 615.

166. Compare OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 60.952(1)-(2) (West, Westlaw through Ch. 121 L. Reg. Legis. Sess.) (Oregon's statute regarding remedies available to shareholders of a closely held corporation), with 805 ILL. COMP. STAT. 5/12.56(a)-(b) (2013) (Illinois' statute regarding remedies available to shareholders of private corporations).

167. OR. REV. STAT. § 80.952(2)(b) (West, Westlaw through Ch. 121 L. of 2014 Reg. Legis. Sess.).

168. Id. § 60.952(2)(c).

169. Id. § 60.952(2)(d).

170. Id. § 60.952(2)(j).
the matters in dispute.”171 Thus, much like Illinois, Oregon courts are provided with significant discretion to order a variety of remedies in cases involving minority shareholder oppression.

III. VIRGINIA'S GENERAL ASSEMBLY SHOULD EXPAND THE REMEDIES AVAILABLE FOR OPPRESSION

Virginia's General Assembly should follow Illinois and Oregon's lead and add equitable remedies to the oppression statute. The statute should track the language of Oregon's statute by providing a list of remedies, including alteration of the corporation's articles of incorporation or bylaws, the removal from office of any director or officer, the appointment of an individual as a director or officer, the award of damages to an aggrieved party, or the declaration of dividends. The statute should also explicitly state that the remedies are not exclusive and dissolution should be a last resort option which is only ordered after the court has considered other remedies and deemed them insufficient.

A. Proposed Statute for Virginia

This proposed legislation is taken from Oregon's oppression statute. Although Oregon and Illinois' statute are similar in many aspects, for the reasons discussed below, Oregon's statute better addresses all the concerns raised by minority shareholder oppression. The proposed Virginia statute reads, in pertinent part:172

(1) In a proceeding by a shareholder in a corporation that does not have shares that are listed on a national securities exchange or that are regularly traded in a market maintained by one or more members of a national or affiliated securities association, the circuit court may order one or more of the remedies listed in subsection (2) of this section if it is established that:

(b) The directors or those in control of the corporation have acted, are acting or will act in a manner that is illegal, oppressive or fraudulent;

(2) The remedies that the court may order in a proceeding under subsection (1) of this section include but are not limited to the following:

171. Id. § 80.952(2)(m).
172. This is an excerpted version of the statute. For the full version, see the Appendix.
Performance, prohibition, alteration or setting aside of any action of the corporation or of its shareholders, directors or officers or any other party to the proceeding;

(b) The cancellation or alteration of any provision in the corporation's articles of incorporation or bylaws;

(c) The removal from office of any director or officer;

(d) The appointment of any individual as a director or officer;

(e) An accounting with respect to any matter in dispute;

(f) The appointment of a custodian to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, to serve for the term and under the conditions prescribed by the court;

(g) The appointment of a provisional director to serve for the term and under the conditions prescribed by the court;

(h) The submission of the dispute to mediation or another form of nonbinding alternative dispute resolution;

(i) The issuance of distributions;

(j) The award of damages to any aggrieved party;

(k) The purchase by the corporation or one or more shareholders of all of the shares of one or more other shareholders for their fair value and on the terms determined under subsection (5) of this section;

(l) The retention of jurisdiction of the case by the court for the protection of the shareholder who filed the proceeding; or

(m) The dissolution of the corporation if the court determines that no remedy specified in paragraphs (a) to (l) of this subsection or other alternative remedy is sufficient to resolve the matters in dispute. In determining whether to dissolve the corporation, the court shall consider among other relevant evidence the financial condition of the corporation but may not refuse to dissolve the corporation solely because it has accumulated earnings or current operating profits.

The remedies set forth in subsection (2) of this section shall not be exclusive of other legal and equitable remedies that the court may impose. Except as provided in this subsection, the shareholders of a corporation may, pursuant to an agreement, agree to limit or eliminate any of the remedies set forth in subsection (2) of this section. The remedies set forth in subsection (2)(e), (j) and (m) [referring to an accounting, an award of damages, and dissolution] of this section may not be eliminated.

In determining the appropriate remedies to order under subsection (2) of this section, the court may take into consideration the reasonable expectations of the corporation's shareholders as they existed at the time the corporation was formed and developed during the course of the shareholders' relationship with the corporation and with each other. The court shall endeavor to minimize the harm to the business of the corporation.\(^{173}\)

As previously mentioned, Oregon and Illinois’ oppression statutes are, in many respects, mirror images of each other.\(^{174}\) Oregon’s statute, however, does have one significant difference that Virginia should adopt. Under Oregon’s statute, shareholders are allowed to “eliminate any of the remedies” by agreement, except for the award of damages, an accounting, or dissolution.\(^{175}\) As discussed in more detail below,\(^{176}\) this section helps to relieve some of the concerns raised by those skeptical of expanding the statutory remedies available to trial courts in minority shareholder oppression cases. Virginia would do well to follow suit and adopt the proposed statute containing a similar provision.

B. Benefits of Expanding the Statutory Remedies in Oppression Cases

Courts in other states have found that the MBCA allows for remedies besides dissolution, including buy-outs and the appointment of custodial receivers to monitor the corporation.\(^{177}\) Courts in these states have allowed for other remedies because, among other reasons: (i) additional options increases the likelihood that a judge will order an effective remedy, (ii) the courts should offer some protection to minority shareholders who inherit their shares or fail to protect themselves when they enter into a closely held corporation, and (iii) less drastic remedies help prevent power imbalances that are too in favor of either the majority shareholder or the minority shareholder.

1. Alternative Remedy

First, additional remedies that will order an effective remedy to minority shareholders. A court decision between 1964 and 1976 ordered, compounding, or ordered in ten cases, dissolution or buy-outs. Thus, a buy-out is a common alternative that allows for this conclusion.\(^{178}\) In 1964 and 1976 ended the plain with the buy-outs were not in the minority business.\(^{181}\) Virginia has also foregone the ability to forego a dissolution.\(^{184}\)

173. As a note, Virginia’s pre-trial buy-out statute would still be an option to the defendants or the corporation, as a way to end litigation prior to a trial. VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-749.1 (Cum. Supp. 2013).
174. Compare OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 60.952(1) (West, Westlaw through Ch. 121 L. of 2014 Reg. Legis. Sess.) (setting forth the remedies available to shareholders of a closely held corporation), with 805 ILL. COMP. STAT. 5/12.56(a) (2013) (setting forth the remedies available to shareholders of a private corporation).
175. OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 60.952(3) (West, Westlaw through Ch. 121 L. of 2014 Reg. Legis. Sess.).
176. See infra Part III(B).
177. See supra Parts II(B), (C).
First, additional remedies increase the likelihood that a judge will order an effective remedy, thereby giving greater protection to minority shareholders. In a study that analyzed forty-seven court decisions involving minority shareholder oppression between 1984 and 1985, buy-outs were the most common remedy ordered, comprising 54% of the cases, with dissolution only being ordered in ten of the cases (or 27%) and other relief besides dissolution or buy-outs being ordered in three other cases (8%).

Thus, a buy-out was the predominant remedy ordered in jurisdictions that allowed equitable remedies. Another study confirmed this conclusion, finding that 54% of cases initiated between 1960 and 1976 ended a buy-out, even in cases where the court denied the plaintiffs relief. Further, the 1985 study found that buy-outs were most common in cases involving a family owned business. With buy-outs being so common, courts should be given the ability to order this remedy.

As discussed above, Virginia already has a pre-trial buy-out option. Thus, it would appear that Virginia has provided the most common alternative remedy and no additional change is necessary. However, while pre-trial buy-outs are an option that defendants and corporations should have available to them, some might decide instead to proceed to trial. Under the current statutory regime, once the defendant and corporation have decided to forego a pre-trial buy-out, the only other remedy available is dissolution. The pre-trial buy-out, therefore, does nothing to remedy the court's reluctance to order dissolution nor does it help protect minority shareholders should the majority not want to buy them out.

2. Courts Should Provide Some Protection to Minority Shareholders Who Fail to Protect Themselves or Who Inherit Their Shares

Second, the General Assembly should recognize the realities of human psychology; that is, that people are inherently optimistic about their own future. Although most minority shareholders have the opportunity to protect themselves prior to purchasing shares, with the exception being shareholders who are gifted or inherit their stock, many fail to do so. Even well-educated people might get caught up in the romanticism of starting a business with their friends or family and, in so doing, decide that the costs of protection (including hiring an attorney to draft employment or buy-sell agreements) outweigh any potential risk—especially when the probabilities of those risks are so far-fetched in the subjective minds of the would-be minority shareholders. Further, there is still the segment of minority shareholders who do not have the opportunity to protect themselves because they either inherited or were gifted their stock. These individuals may have by the defendant or the corporation. Id. § 13.1-749.1(A) (Cum. Supp. 2013).

185. Molitor, supra note 2, at 554.
186. See id. at 496–96, 554.
187. Moll, supra note 30, at 912; see also Meiselman v. Meiselman, 397 S.E.2d 551, 558 (N.C. 1983) (observing that “close corporations are often formed by friends or family members who simply may not believe that disagreements could ever arise”). Further, some individuals might not be comfortable raising the issue of potential future conflict and protective agreements, especially when their partners are friends or family. Although clearly not the exact same situation, it is interesting to consider the unpopularity of prenuptial agreements even when a person’s financial security is at stake. See Beth Potter, For Many, Prenups Seem to Predict Doom, HARV. U. GAZETTE (Oct. 16, 2003), http://www.news.harvard.edu/gazette/2003/10.16/01-prenup.html. Although this might seem like an almost laughable comparison in the world of business, it is important to remember the kinds of people who are more likely to get caught in a cycle of oppression: individuals who do not have business backgrounds and start a company with their friends or family. See Molitor, supra note 2, at 491, 554. Thus, minority shareholders, if aware of the types of protection available, may be uncomfortable raising these issues and instead decide to forego an uncomfortable conversation with the hope and belief that no issues will arise in the future.

188. Some may argue that, although the descendants had no opportunity to protect themselves, the original shareholder who bequeathed the minority shares did have such an opportunity and failed to secure any protection. Thus, Guy Dixon, who originally bought the kyanite mine and founded the Disthene Group, had the opportunity to leave a large portion of his estate to his children, which, with the approval of the majority shareholders, the descendants could have obtained. Instead, the descendants proposed a buyout to dissolve the corporation after a settlement agreement was not reached.

3. Less Draconian Remedy

Finally, in the interest of fairness, courts may consider the substantial value of the corporation and the significant value of the minority shareholders’ shares. As some have suggested, if the court orders the dissolution of the corporation, it is analogous to a jury returning a verdict of death in a criminal case. As the North Carolina Supreme Court observed, “whether to order the dissolution of a corporation is a significant matter”—so much so that “the corporation may be dissolved only when it appears that the purpose for which it was organized has been substantially accomplished or has been abandoned and cannot be pursued with reasonable prospect of success.”

189. Hetherington MBCA “require[s] that a showing of corporate dissolution be made by the majority shareholder and minority shareholders”). See, e.g., Scott v. Trans-Syndicator, Inc., 569 F.2d 1267 (D.C. Cir. 1977) (determining that the state law requirement that a court order dissolution upon a finding of corporate dissipation was not a due process violation).
190. See, e.g., McKelway v. Disthene Group, Inc., 529 S.E.2d 712, 717 (Va. 2000) (finding that the evidence was undisputable that the corporation had not suffered any corporate change, such as dissolution or conversion, between the minority shareholder and the majority shareholder, and therefore the minority shareholder properly brought suit).
or does it help some not want to

Who Inherit

the realities of currently optimistic shareholders are purchasing everyone who are gifted or educated people— particularly in a business venture that the costs of employment or risk—especially disadvantaged in the sub­sequently.

Further, situations who do not foresee future problems arising from a minority shareholder situation, particularly in a family situation where the inheriting parties are siblings or otherwise related.

This argument ignores the fact that most individuals do not foresee future problems arising from a minority shareholder situation, particularly in a family situation where the inheriting parties are siblings or otherwise related.

Colgate v. Disthene Grp., Inc., 85 Va. Cir. 286, 287 (2012) (Buckingham County). This argument ignores the fact that most individuals do not foresee future problems arising from a minority shareholder situation, particularly in a family situation where the inheriting parties are siblings or otherwise related.

This reluctance to order dissolution undermines the very purpose of the oppression statute—that is, to protect minority shareholders.

Accordingly, alternative remedies are necessary to provide courts with flexibility to respond to the various circumstances presented in a case.

his son and daughter an equal share of the business, but chose to create a majority shareholder and minority shareholder. Colgate v. Disthene Grp., Inc., 85 Va. Cir. 286, 287 (2012) (Buckingham County). This argument ignores the fact that most individuals do not foresee future problems arising from a minority shareholder situation, particularly in a family situation where the inheriting parties are siblings or otherwise related.

Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 287.

Hetherinton & Dooley, supra note 180, at 9–11 (An oppression action under the MBCA "require[s] the minority to establish that the majority’s conduct is sufficiently culpable to give rise to an action for damages at common law ... [even in cases involving] disputable value judgments where courts are traditionally reluctant to interfere with management decisions.").

See, e.g., Moll, supra note 30 at 893–94; see Drastic Times, supra note 7; see also Scott v. Trans-System, 64 P.3d 1, 10 (Wash. 2003) (finding that the defendants’ conduct did not rise to the continuous level necessary to justify dissolution of the corporation).

Although plaintiffs may also bring fiduciary duty claims, the only additional remedy available to them is damages. While paying damages may bring about a change in the corporate culture, a fiduciary duty claim does not allow a court to judicially sever ties between the minority shareholder and the corporation, a remedy that might be necessary given the souring of relationships that led to the lawsuit in the first place.
Those critical of adding equitable remedies to the oppression provision in Virginia’s dissolution statute, or alternatively adopting an independent oppression statute, offer several counter-arguments against doing so. Those counter-arguments include: (i) there are very few cases that actually proceed to trial, (ii) minority shareholders should protect themselves, and (iii) allowing alternative remedies puts too much power in the hands of the judiciary to essentially oversee businesses.

1. Few Cases Actually Advance to Trial

Very few cases alleging minority shareholder oppression are actually brought in Virginia, raising the question of whether additional remedies are necessary to handle so few cases. Indeed, since 2005, when the Virginia General Assembly allowed pre-trial buy-out options, only two cases alleging oppression have gone to trial. 193 Further, some may argue that a minority shareholder is not bound to bring a dissolution cause of action as his only hope for remedying a case of oppression; instead, minority shareholders may also bring fiduciary duty claims or other business tort claims.

In Colgate, one of only two cases brought following the enactment of the pre-trial buyout option in Virginia, the minority shareholders also brought a breach of fiduciary duty claim against the majority shareholders, 194 who were also directors. Under Virginia Code section 13.1-690, “[a] director shall discharge his duties as a director, including his duties as a member of a committee, in accordance with his good faith business judgment of the best interests of the corporation.” 195 They likely would have won at the trial court level on a fiduciary duty claim. The Colgate court found that the business judgment rule did not protect the majority shareholders since “Disthene’s board of directors did not act as a bona fide court went o...
es to

he oppression atively adopt-veral counterats include: (i) al, (ii) mini-
i) allowing al-
do the judi-
pression are f whether ad-cases. Indeed, owed pre-trial have gone to shareholder is his only hope shareholder-busine tort ng the enact-
the minority \- duty claim directors. Un-al discharge member of a ess judgment
y would have
. The Colgate
ot protect the ectors did not act as a board and make informed decisions." Further, the trial court went on to find that the board “merely bent to [the majority shareholder's] ironhanded will and rubberstamped his decisions,” and that “[the majority shareholder and his son] were motivated not by the best interests of the corporation, but by their personal best interests.”

A fiduciary duty claim, however, would not have ended the family dispute. Although a successful fiduciary duty claim would have provided the plaintiffs with a steady stream of income, it might not have stopped continued oppression by the majority shareholders. While this theory is necessarily speculative, the majority shareholders' past actions show a pattern of continued oppression unheeded by judicial action. Several years before the oppression lawsuit, the Colgate plaintiffs filed a lawsuit alleging the looting of the plaintiff's stock, which the majority shareholder moved out of the family trust and placed into one of the corporation's many holdings. Following a ruling for the plaintiffs and a severe rebuking from the bench, the defendant majority holders agreed to settle the case. Despite the consequences of the trust litigation, the majority shareholders soon cut the plain-tiff's dividends while increasing their own pay and bonuses. The majority shareholders' continued oppressive conduct eventually led to the dissolution lawsuit. Thus, as the Colgate case shows, equitable remedies are necessary to adequately respond to the cases that appear before Virginia courts.

2. Minority Shareholders Can Protect Themselves with Contracts

Another argument offered is that, in most cases, minority shareholders can protect themselves by entering into employment agreements, buy-sell agreements, and other contracts prior to investing in a corporation. Unfortunately, human nature leads inexperienced investors to be overly optimistic of the business's

196. Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 294.
197. Id.
198. Id. at 288; see McKelway, Chase City Man, supra note 70.
199. McKelway, Chase City Man, supra note 70; see Colgate, 85 Va. Cir. at 288.
201. Id.
likely success and too trusting of their business partners. For example, in the hypothetical discussed in Part I, C invested in a corporation with two of his friends. C believed that, as an equal owner, his status as an employee of the corporation was protected and did not protect himself with a buy-sell agreement or an employment contract. Unfortunately for C, his employee status was not protected and business conflicts led A and B to agree to fire C and cut dividend payments.

In order to prevent future investors from making the same mistakes as C, some scholars argue that business owners should be required to learn about ways to protect themselves prior to entering into a business agreement. Prospective owners of a corporation could be required to read a document that outlines potential risks and ways to protect against those risks prior to being able to register a corporation. These documents would be maintained by the state and made available on the state’s website.

This approach, however, would not work for individuals who inherited a corporation, like the plaintiffs in Colgate. It was, in fact, the original owner of the corporation (the plaintiffs’ grandfather and defendant’s father) who left them with a minority/majority shareholder situation, instead of giving each line of descendants an equal share in the corporation. Yet, requiring some education prior to the registration of a closely held corporation would probably reduce the likelihood of oppression and would lessen the need for alternatives to dissolution.

Further, the proposed statute would allow savvy shareholders to protect themselves with contracts on the front end while also protecting those shareholders that did not foresee potential problems or who were unable to protect themselves. The proposed legislation allows shareholders to agree to eliminate all the alternative remedies listed, excepting the award of damages, an approach, or any of these alternates can contract the goal—protect holders are a corpora finally, the power in favor with a able, courts the only remedy being a minority shareholders remedies remained the minority position prior to the Hands of

A final argument minority shareholders’ judiciary’s powerlessness. It is been dismissed substitution may now equitable relief still applies in that a direct business judgment

202. Thompson, supra note 1, at 705; see also supra notes 185–87 and accompanying text.
203. See supra Part I(A).
204. See Molitor, supra note 2, at 496.
205. See id.
206. See id. at 575.
208. See supra Part III(A).
209. See supra.
210. As one scholar may be the legal circumstances, “[b]y the damaged beyond crushing; and key and its customers corporation and conniving minoritization.”
211. See VA. C
counting, or dissolution. Thus, shareholders who do not want these alternative remedies to be available in any future disputes can contract them away. This does not hinder the statute’s main goal—protection of minority shareholders—because those shareholders are agreeing to terms up front instead of informally forming a corporation with very little protection.

Finally, the proposed statute helps prevent an imbalance of power in favor of the minority shareholder, who could threaten havoc with an oppression suit. With alternative remedies available, courts that were once hesitant to provide any remedy because the only remedy was dissolution may now be more willing to order lesser remedies. The increased likelihood of some sort of remedy being awarded to the plaintiff increases the power of the minority shareholder. Allowing for an opt-out of almost all the remedies restores that balance of power while also ensuring that the minority shareholder understands the vulnerability of his position prior to exchanging consideration for stock.

3. Allowing Alternative Remedies Places Too Much Power in the Hands of the Judiciary

A final argument against expanding equitable remedies in minority shareholder oppression cases is that doing so increases the judiciary’s power and allows a judge to essentially oversee businesses. It is certainly true that cases that might have previously been dismissed because the judge was reluctant to order dissolution may now instead see a ruling in favor of the plaintiff with an equitable remedy ordered. However, the business judgment rule still applies in cases of oppression and still creates a presumption that a director has acted “in accordance with his good faith business judgment of the best interests of the corporation.”

209. See supra Part III(A).

210. As one scholar pointed out, “[t]raditional litigation of such shareholder disputes may be the legal equivalent of killing the goose that lays the golden egg.” In such circumstances, “[b]y the time the parties’ rights are finally adjudicated, the company may be damaged beyond repair: Working relationships are destroyed; legal fees and costs are crushing; and key employees are distracted from attending to the needs of the enterprise and its customers.” Marmaduke, supra note 115. Therefore, it is in the best interest of the corporation and the majority shareholders to avoid litigation when possible, giving the conniving minority shareholder the power to hold the corporation hostage to potential litigation.

until after the plaintiff has rebutted this presumption and proven oppression that a judge can grant equitable remedies.\(^{212}\) Equitable remedies thus protect minority shareholders while not overstepping or overruling the business judgment rule.

CONCLUSION

Currently, minority shareholders who allege oppression in Virginia may only request dissolution as a remedy.\(^{213}\) While many states, either through legislation or case law, have found that courts have the power to order remedies other than dissolution,\(^{214}\) the Supreme Court of Virginia has ruled otherwise.\(^{215}\) Thus, the supreme court has placed the ball squarely in the General Assembly's court—if additional remedies are to be provided, it must be the General Assembly who acts to change the statute and explicitly allow such remedies. Legislatures in other states, such as Oregon, have done just that by adding a non-exhaustive list of alternative remedies to their dissolution statutes in cases of minority shareholder oppression.\(^{216}\) The General Assembly should follow Oregon's lead by adopting the proposed oppression statute or, at the very least, adding equitable remedies to the dissolution statute, thereby granting Virginia's trial courts the discretionary power to order an appropriate remedy based on the unique facts of a case.

212. As one of the plaintiff's attorneys in Colgate noted, "[u]ntil now, majority shareholders at many companies in Virginia and elsewhere have been able to run a company for their own benefit while running roughshod over minority shareholders." Disthene Group Settlement Bolsters Minority Shareholders' Rights, LECLAIR RYAN (Aug. 22, 2013), http://www.leclairryan.com/news/xprNewsDetail.aspx?xpST=NewsDetail&news=1007.

213. See supra notes 50–57 and accompanying text.

216. See, e.g., OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 60.952(1)(b) (West, Westlaw through Ch. 121 L. of 2014 Reg. Legis. Sess.).
The full proposed statute would read:

(1) In a proceeding by a shareholder in a corporation that does not have shares that are listed on a national securities exchange or that are regularly traded in a market maintained by one or more members of a national or affiliated securities association, the circuit court may order one or more of the remedies listed in subsection (2) of this section if it is established that:

(a) The directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock and irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered, or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally, because of the deadlock;
(b) The directors or those in control of the corporation have acted, are acting or will act in a manner that is illegal, oppressive or fraudulent;
(c) The shareholders are deadlocked in voting power and have failed, for a period that includes at least two consecutive annual meeting dates, to elect successors to directors whose terms have expired; or
(d) The corporate assets are being misapplied or wasted.

(2) The remedies that the court may order in a proceeding under subsection (1) of this section include but are not limited to the following:

(a) The performance, prohibition, alteration or setting aside of any action of the corporation or of its shareholders, directors or officers or any other party to the proceeding;
(b) The cancellation or alteration of any provision in the corporation’s articles of incorporation or bylaws;
(c) The removal from office of any director or officer;
(d) The appointment of any individual as a director or officer;
(e) An accounting with respect to any matter in dispute;
(f) The appointment of a custodian to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, to serve for the term and under the conditions prescribed by the court;
(g) The appointment of a provisional director to serve for the term and under the conditions prescribed by the court;
(h) The submission of the dispute to mediation or another form of nonbinding alternative dispute resolution;
(i) The issuance of distributions;
(j) The award of damages to any aggrieved party;
(k) The purchase by the corporation or one or more shareholders of all of the shares of one or more other shareholders for their fair value and on the terms determined under subsection (5) of this section;

(1) The retention of jurisdiction of the case by the court for the protection of the shareholder who filed the proceeding; or

(m) The dissolution of the corporation if the court determines that no remedy specified in paragraphs (a) to (l) of this subsection or other alternative remedy is sufficient to resolve the matters in dispute. In determining whether to dissolve the corporation, the court shall consider among other relevant evidence the financial condition of the corporation but may not refuse to dissolve the corporation solely because it has accumulated earnings or current operating profits.

(3) The remedies set forth in subsection (2) of this section shall not be exclusive of other legal and equitable remedies that the court may impose. Except as provided in this subsection, the shareholders of a corporation may, pursuant to an agreement, agree to limit or eliminate any of the remedies set forth in subsection (2) of this section. The remedies set forth in subsection (2)(e), (j) and (m) [referring to an accounting, an award of damages, and dissolution] of this section may not be eliminated.

(4) In determining the appropriate remedies to order under subsection (2) of this section, the court may take into consideration the reasonable expectations of the corporation's shareholders as they existed at the time the corporation was formed and developed during the course of the shareholders' relationship with the corporation and with each other. The court shall endeavor to minimize the harm to the business of the corporation.

(5)(a) If the court orders a share purchase, the court shall:

(i) Determine the fair value of the shares, with or without the assistance of appraisers, taking into account any impact on the value of the shares resulting from the actions giving rise to a proceeding under subsection (1) of this section;

(ii) Consider any financial or legal constraints on the ability of the corporation or the purchasing shareholder to purchase the shares;

(iii) Specify the terms of the purchase, including, if appropriate, terms for installment payments, interest at the rate and from the date determined by the court to be equitable, subordination of the purchase obligation to the rights of the corporation's other creditors, security for a deferred purchase price and a covenant not to compete or other restriction on the seller;

(iv) Require the seller to deliver all of the seller's shares to the purchaser upon receipt of the purchase price or the first installment of the purchase price; and

(v) Retain jurisdiction to enforce the purchase order by, among other remedies, ordering the corporation to be dissolved if the purchase is not completed in accordance with the terms of the purchase order.

(A) The share purchase ordered under this subsection shall be consummated within 20 days after the date the order becomes final unless before that time the corporation files with the court a notice of its intention to dissolve and articles of dissolution are properly filed with the Secretary of State within 50 days after filing the notice with the court.

(B) After the purchase order is entered and before the purchase price is fully paid, any party may petition the court to modify the terms of the purchase, and the court may do so if the court finds that the modifications are equitable.

(C) Unless the purchase order is modified by the court, the selling shareholder shall have no further rights as a shareholder from the date the seller delivers all of the shareholder’s shares to the purchaser or such other date specified by the court.

(6) In any proceeding under subsection (1) of this section, the court shall allow reasonable compensation to the custodian, provisional director, appraiser or other such person appointed by the court for services rendered and reimbursement or direct payment of reasonable costs and expenses. Amounts described in this subsection shall be paid by the corporation.

Stephanie Martinez *

* J.D., 2014, University of Richmond School of Law; B.A., 2010, James Madison University. A special thank you to Professor Jessica Erickson, who never seemed to tire of my constant questions and office visits. I am also deeply indebted to the staff of the University of Richmond Law Review, who spent countless hours, during the summer no less, working on this comment. Finally, I would like to thank my friends and family, and especially my husband Jonathan, for their support and encouragement.