A Survey of the History of the Death Penalty in the United States

Sheherezade C. Malik
University of Richmond

D. Paul Holdsworth
University of Richmond

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarship.richmond.edu/law-student-publications

Part of the Criminal Procedure Commons, and the Legal History Commons

Recommended Citation

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the School of Law at UR Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Law Student Publications by an authorized administrator of UR Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact scholarshiprepository@richmond.edu.
A SURVEY OF THE HISTORY OF THE DEATH PENALTY IN THE UNITED STATES

Sheherzade C. Malik *
D. Paul Holdsworth **

INTRODUCTION

Since the founding of Jamestown Colony in 1607, few topics in American life and culture have generated as much controversy, both in terms of persistence and volatility, as the death penalty. Foreign policy, economic recessions, and social movements come to the forefront of national discussion in their own respective ebbs and flows. Capital punishment, however, has been a staple of the American criminal justice system since the early inhabiting of the continent, and has remained a permanent vehicle through which we can enact retribution on the most heinous criminal offenders in our society, ridding ourselves of the worst among us.

I. THE DEATH PENALTY: FROM THE FOUNDINGS THROUGH NINETEENTH CENTURY AMERICA

The American colonists inherited their use of capital punishment from Great Britain, although the American colonists were more conservative than their English counterparts in many re-
In early America, the number of offenses that could potentially warrant the death penalty was substantially more expansive than would be socially and constitutionally acceptable today. Take adultery, for example. In 1644, the Massachusetts Bay Colony executed Mary Latham and James Britton for “betray[ing] [Latham’s] elderly husband and boast[ing] of it.” And while some laws punishable by death, including theft and rebelliousness of children, were generally “bark and no bite,” others, such as murder and rape, unequivocally warranted the death penalty.

The death penalty was also a commonplace punishment for criminal recidivism in early America. For example, an early Virginia law imposed the death penalty for a third stealing offense. Specifically, a first offense for stealing another’s hog was “worth twenty-five lashes and a fine; the second offense meant two hours in the pillory, nailed by the ears, plus a fine. The third offense brought death.” Similarly, in Massachusetts, “a first-time burglar was to be branded on the forehead with the letter B; a second offender was to be branded and whipped,” but a third offense would trigger the death penalty, as the individual was labeled “incorrigible.”

However, not only was there a draconian breadth as to which actions could be punished by death in the colonial period, there was also an aspect of arbitrariness in capital punishment, and punishment in general. For example, and somewhat interestingly, child rape was not originally a capital offense because it was not, “biblically speaking, a capital crime.” In one Massachusetts Bay child rape incident, instead of execution, the perpetrator’s “nostrils were slit and seared” and he was ordered to wear a noose around his neck made both before and during his punishment.

Additionally, there were many concerns about how capital punishment was to be administered. For example, and somewhat interestingly, child rape was not originally a capital offense because it was not, “biblically speaking, a capital crime.” In one Massachusetts Bay child rape incident, instead of execution, the perpetrator’s “nostrils were slit and seared” and he was ordered to wear a noose around his neck made both before and during his punishment.

For better or worse, the death penalty remained a common occurrence in early America. For example, an early Virginia law imposed the death penalty for a third stealing offense. Specifically, a first offense for stealing another’s hog was “worth twenty-five lashes and a fine; the second offense meant two hours in the pillory, nailed by the ears, plus a fine. The third offense brought death.” Similarly, in Massachusetts, “a first-time burglar was to be branded on the forehead with the letter B; a second offender was to be branded and whipped,” but a third offense would trigger the death penalty, as the individual was labeled “incorrigible.”

However, not only was there a draconian breadth as to which actions could be punished by death in the colonial period, there was also an aspect of arbitrariness in capital punishment, and punishment in general. For example, and somewhat interestingly, child rape was not originally a capital offense because it was not, “biblically speaking, a capital crime.” In one Massachusetts Bay child rape incident, instead of execution, the perpetrator’s “nostrils were slit and seared” and he was ordered to wear a noose around his neck made both before and during his punishment.

Additionally, there were many concerns about how capital punishment was to be administered. For example, and somewhat interestingly, child rape was not originally a capital offense because it was not, “biblically speaking, a capital crime.” In one Massachusetts Bay child rape incident, instead of execution, the perpetrator’s “nostrils were slit and seared” and he was ordered to wear a noose around his neck made both before and during his punishment.

The plain language of this section makes it clear that life could be spared without the right to a fair and impartial process of law.

The plain language of this section makes it clear that life could be spared without the right to a fair and impartial process of law.

The plain language of this section makes it clear that life could be spared without the right to a fair and impartial process of law.
uses that could potentially more easily acceptable to Massachusetts Bay for “betray[ing]” And while some rebelliousness of hers, such as murder penalty. The punishment for apple, an early Virginia stealing offense was “worth three meant two hours. The third offense a first-time burglary letter B; a second at a third offense usual was labeled death as to which possible period, there was punishment, and what interestingly, since it was in Massachusetts the perpetrator’s ordered to wear a.

American History 41 prohibition against “cruel more sparingly than the rules that prevented any Id. at 42–43.

10. Id.
11. Id.
12. Id.
13. Id.
15. Id. at 29–30.
16. U.S. CONST. amend. V.
17. MELUSKY & PESTO, supra note 14, at 35 (emphasis added).
As American society evolved from its predominantly religious beginnings, humanitarian ideals, such as proportionality and the freedom of deprivation, began to take effect and capital punishment was drastically affected.18 Colonial governments were more ambitious in infusing new ideologies into previously “draconian criminal codes.”19 Pennsylvania’s constitution, for example, outlined that punishments should be “less sanguinary and in general more proportionate to the crime.”20 The preamble to Pennsylvania’s murder statute in 1794 further stated that “the punishment of death ought never to be inflicted where it is not absolutely necessary to the public safety.”21

In the majority of post-Revolution states, there was a dramatic decrease in the number of offenses that warranted the death penalty.22 Many states reduced the list of capital offenses to murder, rape, or treason.23 In 1796, Virginia went further and abolished the death penalty for “all crimes committed by whites except premeditated murder.”24

As general sentiment against the death penalty increased, Americans began to reevaluate proportionality and humanitarian concepts in the methods of execution as well. In early America, as in England, public hangings were the most common method of execution.25 Public hangings both served as deterrents and symbols of municipal or societal power.26 Of course, public hangings were at the forefront of one of the most recognizable historical events of the pre-Revolutionary period—the Salem Witch Trials, in which nineteenth-century witchcraft, and societal hysteria periods introduced. This movement punished with

Before this show, individuals awaiting methods of punishment were more attention to the public. 31 After the American, replaced the pill, 32 New York, initiatives "up to date." 33 In an attempt to viewed as more

---

18. THE OXFORD COMPANION TO AMERICAN LAW 26 (Kermit L. Hall ed., 2002) [hereinafter OXFORD COMPANION TO AMERICAN LAW]. While John Locke’s philosophies had an enormous impact on this reformation, it should be noted that “Locke and his American following never questioned the assumption that the power of the state extended to life and death,” as he was “concerned [primarily] with the allocation of the state’s power and its proper ends, not its extent.” MELUSKY & PESTO, supra note 1, at 35.

19. Id.

20. Id.

21. OXFORD COMPANION TO AMERICAN LAW, supra note 18, at 26.

22. Id.

23. Id.

24. Id. Even before 1796, Thomas Jefferson proposed limiting capital punishment in Virginia to treason and murder. FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 73. For the offenses of rape and sodomy, Jefferson proposed castration. Id. Jefferson was also a proponent of strict “eye for an eye” retribution in cases of maiming or disfiguring. See id.

25. Id.

26. Id. at 76.
dominantly religious and capital punishments were more "draconian" for example, outinary and in general "the punishment not absolutely need-ere was a dramatic and visible nature of punishment gave way to less theatricality and more priva-
At the turn of the nineteenth century, both religious leaders and enlightened idealists, such as Benjamin Rush, advocated for complete abolition of the death penalty. This support waned during the mid-nineteenth century in part because the public paid more attention to the anti-slavery movement, the Civil War, and Reconstruction. In the late nineteenth century, some states, like New York, initiated a move in bringing the methods of execution "up to date." In 1888, New York introduced the electrical chair in an attempt to abolish the hangman and noose, which was viewed as more barbaric. A select number of states even at-in which nineteen people were hanged in the summer of 1692 for witchcraft, and another pressed to death by stones, among mass societal hysteria. However, the post-Revolution and Republican periods introduced a calculated shift away from public hangings. This movement was defined by a stark move away from corporal punishment with an emphasis on confinement.

Before this shift, confinement was primarily used to hold individuals awaiting trial or punishment; it was rarely used as a means of punishment in se. The once predominantly public nature of punishment gave way to less theatricality and more privacy. After the American Revolution, "[t]he walled-off penitentiary replaced the pillory and the whipping post; and most states abolished the public festival of hanging." Of course, the public nature of executions was never fully privatized, as newspapers of the late nineteenth century used the power of the press to describe "the major executions in lip-smacking detail." Id. at 170.

28. FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 73 ("One very notable aspect of reform in the period of the republic was the movement to get rid of the hangman.").
29. See id. at 76–77.
30. See id. at 77.
31. See id. at 75–76.
32. Id. at 75. Of course, the public nature of executions was never fully privatized, as newspapers of the late nineteenth century used the power of the press to describe "the major executions in lip-smacking detail." Id. at 170.
33. Id. at 73–74.
34. Part I: History of the Death Penalty, DEATH PENALTY INFO. CTR., www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/part-i-history-death-penalty#earlymid (last visited Feb. 27, 2015) [hereinafter Death Penalty History]; see also FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 93–97 (noting that with the Reconstruction came numerous attempts by Southern states to retain as much legal subjugation of former states as possible, which in turn focused much attention on addressing these issues).
35. FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 170.
36. See id. at 170–71.
tempted full abolition of the death penalty.\textsuperscript{37} Notwithstanding, the death penalty remained in force across the vast majority of the country.

II. THE DEATH PENALTY IN TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY AMERICA

A. 1900–mid-1950s

The Progressive Era (1900–1918)\textsuperscript{38} marked a new chapter in death penalty reform. Among issues involving big business monopoly and the destitution of immigrants, this era experienced an atmosphere of increasing fervor for legal reform favoring the abolition of the death penalty.\textsuperscript{39} During this period, ten U.S. states abolished capital punishment: Minnesota, North Dakota, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Kansas, South Dakota, Missouri, Arizona, and Tennessee.\textsuperscript{40} The work of individuals, organizations, the press, and state governments helped accomplish abolitionist victories.\textsuperscript{41} Even those states that did not wholly abolish the death penalty faced substantial abolition pressure during the Progressive Era.\textsuperscript{42}

\textsuperscript{37} Id. at 74.
\textsuperscript{38} The Progressive Era is characterized as a period during which activist middle-class citizens worked to fix various societal problems that had accompanied industrialization and urbanization at the turn of the twentieth century. \textit{American Experience: The Progressive Movement (1900–1918)}, PBS, http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/americaneperience/features/general-article/eleanor-progressive/ (last visited Feb. 27, 2015).
\textsuperscript{39} Id.
\textsuperscript{40} JOHN F. GALLIHER ET AL., AMERICA WITHOUT THE DEATH PENALTY: STATES LEADING THE WAY 79 (2005) [hereinafter GALLIHER ET AL., STATES LEADING THE WAY].
\textsuperscript{41} In five of these ten states (Arizona, Kansas, Oregon, South Dakota, and Washington), for example, governor lobbying strongly catalyzed anti-death penalty legislation and were affiliated with the Anti-Capital Punishment Society of America, one of several abolitionist organizations that emerged in the Progressive Era. John F. Galliher et al., \textit{Abolition and Reinstatement of Capital Punishment During the Progressive Era and Early 20th Century}, 83 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 538, 547, 559 (1992) [hereinafter Galliher et al., \textit{Progressive Era}]. Press outlets in Colorado and Minnesota also furthered the abolitionist agenda by publishing stories accounting the harsh and grisly details of executions. Id. at 552–53.
\textsuperscript{42} See generally William E. Ross, \textit{The Death Penalty—Reasons for Its Abolition}, 11 VA. L. REV. 625, 626 (1905) (publishing a paper outlining the reasons the death penalty should be abolished in Virginia). The Virginia Law Register argued that the death penalty is a failed deterrent that has proven not to prevent violent crime, and warned that an irrevocable punishment such as death is unwise and unfair when administered by fallible citizens who could potentially condemn the innocent. Id. at 630, 632.
Nonetheless, despite abolitionist victories early in the twentieth century, death penalty reforms proved to be temporary. Of the ten abolitionist states, only two, Minnesota and North Dakota, did not immediately reinstate the death penalty in this post-Progressive period.43 The resurgence in support of capital punishment was partly a result of a societal frenzy in the aftermath of the Russian Revolution, World War I, and intense conflicts aimed against capitalism.44

Moreover, a general decline in societal well-being helped spur reinstatement. Excluding Colorado, all the states that reinstated the death penalty during this period did so during either the recession which immediately followed the end of World War I, or the 1930’s Great Depression.45 The notion that crime would accompany poverty and unemployment46 strengthened society’s view that the death penalty was “a necessary social measure.”47

In fact, the 1930s saw more total executions, 1676, than any other decade,48 and there was no significant opposition to the death penalty.49 Among them, the hanging of Eva Dugan in 1930, the first woman executed in Arizona, brought about reform in terms of methods of execution.50 In a botched hanging, “Dugan’s head was ripped from her body,” causing states to consider the cruel nature of hanging, and therefore to move towards other methods.51 The 1940s experienced only a slight decline in executions, with 1289 total executions.52

43. Galliher et al., States Leading the Way, supra note 40, at 79.
44. Death Penalty History, supra note 34.
45. Galliher et al., Progressive Era, supra note 41, at 543, 575 (noting that “during economic booms, the convict population was a resource to be exploited through such policies as a convict labor system, but during recessions, these same convicts became a threat that encouraged reliance on capital punishment”).
46. Id. at 575.
47. Death Penalty History, supra note 34. Public vigilantism also increased during the economic recessions in the form of lynching, encouraging governments to reinstate the death penalty to restore order and end street justice. Galliher et al., Progressive Era, supra note 41, at 563.
50. Id.
51. Id.
52. Bohm, supra note 48, at 12.
By 1950, the electric chair had become a prevalent method of execution in twenty-six states.\(^{53}\) Still by 1955, eleven states had introduced death by asphyxiation—pumping poisonous gas into gas chambers—as a more humane way of execution.\(^{54}\) With newer, more sophisticated methods of execution on the rise, an increasing number of states began to view death by hanging as “barbaric” and “cruel.”\(^{55}\) Indeed, domestic discourse on the death penalty began to mirror international discussions focusing on the suffering of prisoners on death row.\(^{56}\) The newer methods of execution became more appealing as they were believed to be less painful to the prisoner and less visually disturbing to onlookers.\(^{57}\) These new methods also meant new means of administration. Ordinary individuals could no longer conduct executions; specialists equipped with the knowledge to operate the new equipment became a necessity.\(^{58}\) By the middle of the twentieth century, only a handful of states maintained the practice of sentencing prisoners to the gallows to die.\(^{59}\)

B. 1955—Furman v. Georgia

Between 1955 and the Supreme Court of the United States’ 1972 ruling in Furman v. Georgia, which suspended the use of the death penalty, the decline in the use of the death penalty hit a low during the late 1950s (1955–1968) and early 1969. Hawaii, New York, West Virginia, and Washington, D.C., abolished the death penalty. The abolition of capital punishment was a logical step, constitutionally, rejecting the discretionary imposition of life imprisonment.\(^{60}\)

Nine months before the death penalty was abolished in California that allowed for the possibility of death or life imprisonment, authorities questioned the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.\(^{66}\) However, in Furman v. Georgia, the Court ruled the death penalty unconstitutional on the grounds that the imposition of the death or life imprisonment ‘rattled the conscience away from fixed and historical standards that constitute cruel and unusual punishment.’ The Court’s decision in Furman marked a turning point from fixed and historical standards, to what punishments?
the death penalty in the United States, there was a significant decline in the use of capital punishment. Support for capital punishment hit a record low of 42% by 1966. Several prominent issues during this period, including the civil rights movement (1955–1968) and the Vietnam War (1955–1975), swayed public conscience away from killing. As in the Progressive Era, abolition occurred in a state-to-state, piecemeal fashion. Between 1957 and 1969, Hawaii, Alaska, Delaware, Michigan, Oregon, Iowa, New York, West Virginia, Vermont, and New Mexico abolished the death penalty. Apart from this moral impetus for reform, the abolition of capital punishment began to gain legal merit as authorities questioned whether the death penalty violated the Eighth Amendment’s protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

Nine months before Furman, the Court ruled in McGautha v. California that allowing a jury to decide whether to prescribe death or life imprisonment in capital convictions was not unconstitutional, rejecting claims that giving the jury “unfettered... discretion in imposing death for murder” was arbitrary and capricious.

However, in Furman, the Court found the death penalty unconstitutional on the grounds that it violated the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. This ruling rattled the once stable notion that the death penalty did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. In some respects, the Court’s decision in Furman was inevitable given its move away from fixed and historical meanings previously used to determine what punishments qualified as cruel and unusual. In Trop v.

---

65. Bohm, supra note 48, at 43-44.
66. 402 U.S. 183, 205 (1971); Bohm, supra note 48, at 50.
68. See Corinna Barrett Lain, Deciding Death, 57 Duke L.J. 1, 8-9 (2007).
Dulles, for example, the Supreme Court found that stripping a soldier of his citizenship in response to his desertion during World War II constituted cruel and unusual punishment. In the decision, the Court referenced the 1910 decision in Weems v. United States, in which it found that a punishment of twelve years of hard labor for falsifying documents was cruel and excessive. The Trop court stated, in the context of Weems, “that the words of the [Eighth] Amendment are not precise, and that their scope is not static. The Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.”

Despite McGautha’s refusal to find the death penalty arbitrary and capricious, the defense in Furman argued unconstitutionality on the grounds of both the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, and succeeded in suspending capital punishment across the country. The Furman Court ultimately held that the capital punishment statutes at issue were unconstitutional because they left to the jury’s discretion the decision to impose death, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment right to due process and the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment. In one fell swoop, Furman abolished every death penalty statute across the country and “spared the lives of every man and woman on death row.” Six hundred inmates across thirty-two states had their death sentences commuted to life imprisonment.

The abolition of the death penalty in Furman was by no means an easy and uniform decision for the Justices on the Court. All nine Justices wrote a separate opinion. For Justice Brennan, the death penalty was “cruel and unusual” in all situations as “a denial of the executed person’s humanity.” For Justice Stewart, death sentences were “cruel and unusual” only under current laws in the “same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual,” in other words, because of the way the punishment is applied to criminals. Furman, however, followed the Trop Court’s example of death penalty laws.

However, the Furman Court was not the only body to rule on the constitutionality of the death penalty. In the years following the Furman decision, Florida was the first to reinstating capital punishment. By 1976, nearly every state had its law struck down, and the federal government had to decide the future of the death penalty. In July of 1977, the Supreme Court ruled in capital punishment statutory laws.

C. Post-Furman

In the years following Furman, states had to decide whether to reinstate their statutes and whether the laws previously granted a death penalty.

Florida was the first state to reinstate capital punishment after the Furman decision. By 1977, nearly every state had its law struck down, and the federal government had to decide the future of the death penalty. In July of 1977, the Supreme Court ruled in capital punishment statutory laws.

71. Id. at 100–01 (citing 217 U.S. 349, 382 (1910)).
72. Id. at 100–01.
74. Id.; BOHM, supra note 48, at 52.
75. FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 316.
76. KUMLAC, supra note 49, at 20.
77. FRIEDMAN, supra note 1, at 317.
78. Furman, 408 U.S. 238, 290 (Brennan, J., concurring).
and that stripping a person of his freedom in the event of his desertion during a civil war is cruel and unusual punishment.\textsuperscript{79} In the years immediately following the \textit{Furman} decision, attempts to reinstate or uphold state death penalty laws failed.\textsuperscript{80}

However, the death penalty would not be permanently put to rest as the \textit{Furman} decision merely suspended its use. Capital punishment was not found unconstitutional per se; rather it was the execution—the discriminatory and arbitrary administration—of the death penalty that violated the Eighth Amendment.\textsuperscript{81} Specifically, the majority ruling only found the existing death penalty statutes—and not the death penalty itself—unconstitutional. Thus, states could technically legalize the use of the death penalty if they underwent a process of legislative reform.\textsuperscript{82}

\textbf{C. Post-\textit{Furman—1990s}}

In the years following \textit{Furman}, several states started reforming their statutes to eliminate arbitrary and discriminatory rules that previously guided the process, in order to reinstate the death penalty.

Florida was the first state to pass new death penalty laws, reinstating capital punishment only five months after the \textit{Furman} decision.\textsuperscript{83} By 1975, thirty states had again passed death penalty laws and nearly 200 people sat on death row.\textsuperscript{84} The Court now had to decide the constitutionality of these new death penalty laws. In July of 1976, four years after \textit{Furman}, the Court handed down its ruling for five test cases involving felony murder, each representing a state that had enacted one of the five types of new unusual,” in other words, capital punishment was unconstitutional because only “a capriciously selected random handful [of criminals]” get sentenced to death.\textsuperscript{79} In the years immediately following the \textit{Furman} decision, attempts to reinstate or uphold state death penalty laws failed.\textsuperscript{80}

However, the death penalty would not be permanently put to rest as the \textit{Furman} decision merely suspended its use. Capital punishment was not found unconstitutional per se; rather it was the execution—the discriminatory and arbitrary administration—of the death penalty that violated the Eighth Amendment.\textsuperscript{81} Specifically, the majority ruling only found the existing death penalty statutes—and not the death penalty itself—unconstitutional. Thus, states could technically legalize the use of the death penalty if they underwent a process of legislative reform.\textsuperscript{82}

\textbf{C. Post-\textit{Furman—1990s}}

In the years following \textit{Furman}, several states started reforming their statutes to eliminate arbitrary and discriminatory rules that previously guided the process, in order to reinstate the death penalty.

Florida was the first state to pass new death penalty laws, reinstating capital punishment only five months after the \textit{Furman} decision.\textsuperscript{83} By 1975, thirty states had again passed death penalty laws and nearly 200 people sat on death row.\textsuperscript{84} The Court now had to decide the constitutionality of these new death penalty laws. In July of 1976, four years after \textit{Furman}, the Court handed down its ruling for five test cases involving felony murder, each representing a state that had enacted one of the five types of new unusual,” in other words, capital punishment was unconstitutional because only “a capriciously selected random handful [of criminals]” get sentenced to death.\textsuperscript{79} In the years immediately following the \textit{Furman} decision, attempts to reinstate or uphold state death penalty laws failed.\textsuperscript{80}

However, the death penalty would not be permanently put to rest as the \textit{Furman} decision merely suspended its use. Capital punishment was not found unconstitutional per se; rather it was the execution—the discriminatory and arbitrary administration—of the death penalty that violated the Eighth Amendment.\textsuperscript{81} Specifically, the majority ruling only found the existing death penalty statutes—and not the death penalty itself—unconstitutional. Thus, states could technically legalize the use of the death penalty if they underwent a process of legislative reform.\textsuperscript{82}

\textbf{C. Post-\textit{Furman—1990s}}

In the years following \textit{Furman}, several states started reforming their statutes to eliminate arbitrary and discriminatory rules that previously guided the process, in order to reinstate the death penalty.

Florida was the first state to pass new death penalty laws, reinstating capital punishment only five months after the \textit{Furman} decision.\textsuperscript{83} By 1975, thirty states had again passed death penalty laws and nearly 200 people sat on death row.\textsuperscript{84} The Court now had to decide the constitutionality of these new death penalty laws. In July of 1976, four years after \textit{Furman}, the Court handed down its ruling for five test cases involving felony murder, each representing a state that had enacted one of the five types of new unusual,” in other words, capital punishment was unconstitutional because only “a capriciously selected random handful [of criminals]” get sentenced to death.\textsuperscript{79} In the years immediately following the \textit{Furman} decision, attempts to reinstate or uphold state death penalty laws failed.\textsuperscript{80}

However, the death penalty would not be permanently put to rest as the \textit{Furman} decision merely suspended its use. Capital punishment was not found unconstitutional per se; rather it was the execution—the discriminatory and arbitrary administration—of the death penalty that violated the Eighth Amendment.\textsuperscript{81} Specifically, the majority ruling only found the existing death penalty statutes—and not the death penalty itself—unconstitutional. Thus, states could technically legalize the use of the death penalty if they underwent a process of legislative reform.\textsuperscript{82} death penalty laws. In Woodson v. North Carolina and Roberts v. Louisiana, the Court found statutes that imposed the death penalty for all capital crimes unconstitutional, arguing that not all defendants are the same, and therefore, punishing all capital murder defendants with death is as unduly harsh as arbitrarily imposing the punishment.

On the other hand, in Gregg v. Georgia, the Court upheld the constitutionality of new state statutes that established guidelines for juries and judges when deciding whether to impose the death penalty. The Gregg decision also spurned some important death penalty reforms including the adoption of strict sentencing guidelines, bifurcated trials, and proportionality review.

In 1977, after states began reinstating capital punishment, the firing squad became the primary method of execution. Shortly thereafter, Oklahoma became the first state to adopt lethal injection, although the first lethal injection execution did not occur until 1982 in Texas. From the mid-1970s through the 1980s, public approval of the death penalty was on a gradual, steady incline, and the number of executions increased as capital punishment regained momentum, once again becoming a significant aspect of the justice system.

---

85. BOHM, supra note 48, at 56.
86. 428 U.S. 280, 305 (1976).
90. BOHM, supra note 48, at 57.
91. Death Penalty History, supra note 34.
92. Id.
94. KUDLAC, supra note 49, at 20–21.
97. Abolitionist and Amnesty International News, available at www.deathpenaltyinfo.org (last visited Jan. 6, 2015) (noting that ninety-seven countries have abolished the death penalty in practice, and fifty-eight states or provinces have abolished it in law).
98. Id.
100. Ford, 477 U.S. at 402.
102. See Thompson, 481 U.S. at 69.
While the 1980s represented a popularization of the death penalty in the United States, capital punishment was increasingly unpopular in the international community. Treaties, such as the 1984 United Nations Convention Against Torture and the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child, encouraged nations to limit or abolish the use of capital punishment. By the turn of the twenty-first century, a significant majority of countries had abolished the death penalty. This paradox appears particularly stark when acknowledging that the United States is repeatedly one of the world’s leaders in annually confirmed executions, finding itself in the same category as countries such as China, Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, North Korea, and Yemen.

Despite international pressure, the United States continues to embrace the use of the death penalty, and the Supreme Court continues to struggle with the proper boundaries for capital punishment within the confines of the Eighth Amendment. For example, in Penry v. Lynaugh, Thompson v. Oklahoma, and Ford v. Wainwright, the Court respectively ruled on the constitutionality of executing the mentally ill, the mentally retarded, and juveniles. More specifically, the Court ruled that executing the insane is unconstitutional; executing the mentally retarded is constitutional—although retardation would be a mitigating factor during sentencing—and executing juveniles below sixteen years of age is unconstitutional in states that do not have a set minimum age in their death penalty statutes. In 1989, the Court further ruled in Stanford v. Kentucky that it is not unconstitutional for sixteen and seventeen year olds to be sentenced to death.

95. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, 1465 U.N.T.S. 85.
97. Abolitionist and Retentionist Countries, DEATH PENALTY INFO. CTR., http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/abolitionist-and-retentionist-countries (last visited Feb. 27, 2015) (noting that ninety-eight countries have abolished the death penalty for all crimes, seven countries have abolished it for ordinary crimes only, thirty-five are abolitionist in practice, and fifty-eight still retain the death penalty either in law or practice).
98. Id.
102. See Thompson, 487 U.S. at 838.
Race also remains a pervasive point of debate. Statistically, states with the "highest concentrations of non-white citizens have used the death penalty most frequently." In 1987, in McCleskey v. Kemp, the Supreme Court held that racial disparities do not per se prove a violation of the Equal Protection Clause, although intentional racial discrimination, if shown, could certainly trigger constitutional protection.

As with the historical trend of shifting approval and disapproval of the death penalty, the boundaries set by the Court were revisited in succeeding years.

D. 1990s–Present

In the most recent decades, the Supreme Court has continued to build off its post-Furman jurisprudence. In Atkins v. Virginia, the Supreme Court held that executing a mentally retarded individual would violate the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. A few years later, in Roper v. Simmons, the Supreme Court held that the Eighth Amendment forbids the imposition of the death penalty on juveniles under the age of eighteen. The Supreme Court has gradually and persistently refined the parameters of the Eighth Amendment and whittled down the death penalty’s reach. Despite this, since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1977 to date, 1402 executions have taken place. Public support for the death penalty also reached an all-time high in the mid-1990s, with 78% of Americans in favor of the death penalty for criminals convicted of murder.

104. Gallibert et al., Progressive Era, supra note 41, at 541. In fact, of the states that had originally abolished the death penalty during the Progressive Era, only Arizona and Tennessee had populations with “more than five percent minority citizens.” Id. at 542.
108. See supra notes 100–07.
Admittedly, since then, support for the death penalty has slowly declined. Id. (noting that in October 2011 support for the death penalty fell as low as 58%).
Towards the end of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first, many studies began acknowledging the effect of race on capital punishment cases and death penalty decision-making. Among them, a 2003 report completed by the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia provides statistical data on the race of victims and offenders in capital crimes between 1978 and 2001, and analyzes how race has influenced death sentencing. For example, the study found that, for black defendants, the race of the victim could affect their punishment. More specifically, in cases of capital rape-murder, for example, while defendants were sentenced to death in 70.8% of all such cases, black defendants convicted of the rape and murder of a white victim were sentenced to death in nearly 100% of the cases, while by comparison, black defendants convicted of the rape and murder of a black victim were sentenced to death in only 28.6% of the cases. In general, the study’s analysis of the data reveals racial disparities in death sentencing in Virginia that unduly favors white victims and punishes black defendants. Studies across other states have shown similar results, highlighting the prevalence of racial disparities in deciding the use of capital punishment.

In recent times, the 2011 execution of Troy Davis, an African American man who was convicted of killing a police officer, came to prominence for not highlighting the divide over the use of the death penalty and the racial injustices that plague it. Despite the doubt surrounding Davis’ guilt and the support he received from several prominent officials and organizations, to many, his death symbolized the reality of racial inequalities in the justice system.

113. Id. at 14.
114. Id.
115. Id.
118. See id.
As it currently stands, lethal injection is the overwhelmingly predominant method of execution in the United States.\textsuperscript{119} Since 1976, there have been 1219 executions via lethal injection compared to 158 electrocutions, the next common execution method.\textsuperscript{120} Eight states currently retain electrocution as an authorized method of execution,\textsuperscript{121} three states currently retain the gas chamber,\textsuperscript{122} three states currently retain hanging,\textsuperscript{123} and two states tentatively retain the firing squad in a limited manner,\textsuperscript{124} although each of these states still have lethal injection as the primary execution method.\textsuperscript{125} However, for many states retaining secondary methods of execution, such methods are only retained in case a current method, presumably lethal injection, is found unconstitutional.\textsuperscript{126}

CONCLUSION

Notwithstanding the permanence of the death penalty in the American criminal justice system, its legitimacy is once again at a crossroads. Despite the persisting moral undertones that have always colored capital punishment's main criticisms, in recent years there has been increased criticism emphasizing racial disproportionalities,\textsuperscript{127} the evolution of scientific innocence technology,\textsuperscript{128} and the possibility, recentfaculty in obtaining the legitimacy of America's greatest penalty with the near future, those whose concerns.

This resurgence in the recent botched executions could urge lawmakers to reinstate the correct lethal injections Back on the Table news/1846892-155/firing squads, re-opening policies on the rights of those whose convictions are overturned.\textsuperscript{129}

\textsuperscript{119} Methods of Execution, DEATH PENALTY INFO. CTR., www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/methods-execution (last visited Feb. 27, 2015) [hereinafter Methods].

\textsuperscript{120} Id. (noting also that since 1976 there have been eleven gas chamber executions, three hangings, and another three firing squad executions).

\textsuperscript{121} Id. (listing Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Kentucky, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia).

\textsuperscript{122} Id. (noting Arizona, California, Missouri, and Wyoming).

\textsuperscript{123} Id. (listing Delaware, New Hampshire, and Washington).

\textsuperscript{124} Id. (noting Oklahoma and Utah). However, again, Oklahoma only authorizes the firing squad if lethal injection and electrocution are both found unconstitutional. Id. Utah, on the other hand, authorizes the firing squad for those death row inmates who elected this method prior to Utah's elimination of the firing squad. Id.

\textsuperscript{125} Id.

\textsuperscript{127} Richard C. Dieter, The Death Penalty in Black and White: Who Lives, Who Dies, Who Decides, DEATH PENALTY INFO. CTR. (1998), http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/death-penalty-black-and-white-who-lives-who-dies-who-decides discussing several "race-of-defendant disparities," including research suggesting that a criminal defendant is nearly four times more likely to receive a death sentence if he is black while also noting that 98% of chief district attorneys in counties that employ capital punishment are white).

\textsuperscript{128} See, e.g., DNA Testing, www.justice.gov/capital-punishment that seventeen death sentences have been 311 post-conviction.

\textsuperscript{130} Notwithstanding the recent botched executions, drugs could urge lawmakers to re-open policies on the rights of those whose convictions are overturned.

\textsuperscript{131} Austin Sarat, The death penalty currently has nearly 171 of these exonerations.

\textsuperscript{132} DNA Testing, "[e]yewitness misidentifications, playing a role in many of these exoneration cases," www.innocenceproject.org.

\textsuperscript{133} See Exonerated: 2013/12/04/justice/prisons been 311 post-conviction in 171 of these exonerations.
The overwhelming majority of the United States. Since the lethal injection execution method as an authorized method to retain the gas chamber execution limited manner, injection as the states retaining are only retained injection, is found.

The general global trend away from the death penalty, including among America's greatest allies, makes the intrepid nature of capital punishment within the fabric of our society more glaring. Altogether, this makes for the possibility of very drastic changes in the near future as to how we approach, prosecute, and punish those whose conduct exceeds the tolerable bounds of moral depravity.

This resurgence of anti-death penalty sentiment comes at a time when death penalty discourse and coverage have shifted from constitutional and moral issues to the administration of capital punishment—that is, from being victim-centered to focusing on the rights of the criminal defendant. Modern technology has also allowed for the DNA testing of "skin, saliva, semen, blood or hair" to convict or exonerate death row prisoners. With the increase of actual innocence projects, the gradual limitation of

130. Notwithstanding lethal injection's dominance as the primary method of execution, the recent botched executions coupled with states' difficulties to obtain death penalty drugs could urge lawmakers and courts to overrule or abolish lethal injection as a permissible means of executing death row inmates. In late 2014, Utah lawmakers announced their desire to reinstate the firing squad as the primary method of carrying out executions if the correct lethal injection drugs are not available. Tom Harvey, Firing Squad Executions Back on the Table in Utah Legislature, S.L. TRIB. (Nov. 19, 2014), www.sltrib.com/news/1846892-155/firing-execution-squad-utah-lethal-death. It is entirely foreseeable that a number of states could soon follow suit.

132. DNA Testing, supra note 128. This is of consequence considering that "[eyewitness misidentification is the single greatest cause of wrongful convictions nationwide, playing a role in more than 75% of convictions overturned through DNA testing." Id.

133. See Exonerated: Cases by the Numbers, CNN (Dec. 4, 2013), http://www.cnn.com/2013/12/04/justice/prisoner-exoneration-facts-innocence-project/ (noting that there have been 311 post-conviction DNA exonerations, and the Innocence Project has been involved in 171 of those exonerations); Frequently Asked Questions, INNOCENCE PROJECT, http://www.innocenceproject.org/faqs (last visited Feb. 27, 2015) (noting that the Innocence Project currently has nearly 900 active cases, and, since 1989, 326 people in 37 states have capital punishment by the Supreme Court, the increase in abolition in the international community, and the volatility that has resulted from numerous recent botched executions, a return to Furman is not at all far-fetched.

In Baze v. Rees, the constitutional validity of the death penalty was at issue. The court held that the Eighth Amendment was not violated by the methods employed in Kentucky. The method consisted of three chemicals: thiopental, sodium thiopental, followed by potassium chloride. The method was determined to be constitutional, and the Eighth Amendment was not violated. The findings of the court were that the method was the only method available and lethal injection. For this reason, the lethal injection method was not unconstitutional.