2013

Hernia

Rachel Bevels

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarship.richmond.edu/messenger

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://scholarship.richmond.edu/messenger/vol2013/iss1/55

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by UR Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Messenger by an authorized administrator of UR Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact scholarshiprepository@richmond.edu.
Hernia // Rachel Bevels

On New Year's Eve, you had chest pains You had stopped laughing at my jokes an hour before so I knew you were sick or sad. Your face was paper as we circled around your limp limbs on the couch You grabbed your heart Mom grabbed her keys and She grabbed your hand I reached for something to grab onto. Between teenager and adult, I was ignored at the party and gladly went with you.

Sat in the waiting room with her trying not to laugh at her pointing out the nurse's hair standing a foot off her head in the jaws of an oversized clip Each waiting on you and wondering which of us you were waiting on, but playing friends. Mom came and I went down narrow halls constricting like veins contracting like my gagging stomach at the smell You said little, so we watched the Big Bang Theory And I tried not to look at the needle in your arm, that tear in the fold of your skin much smaller than the opening in your throat that didn't know what to let in and what to keep out and when to stay put and I couldn't stay put because She had to come and I had to go back up the halls where I didn't belong, pushed out the hernia of your heart and into the sights of the nurse whose waving hair wall was less funny alone, until the silence got so loud I couldn't take it and rode back to watch the ball drop with a room full of strangers