The Virginia Law Reporters
Before 1880

Edited by

Preface

For a long time I wondered who compiled Gratt., Hen. & M., Gilm., and the other Virginia legal authorities. A cursory inquiry of the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Virginia reports bear their own names, include the highest political and legal visibilities, Jefferson and George Wythe, as well as perceived lesser known. My curiosity having been aroused, I began a series of biographical sketches of the Virginia law reporters, whose publications are cited by their own names, the older custom. This volume brings together these common interest in law reporting a common bond. The first law professor in America, a United States, a United States attorney general, Supreme Court justice, many Virginia judges, legal scholars, court of last resort, and a poet. These sketches are arranged according to the order in the official series of Virginia Reports with the miscellaneous reports following in alphabetical order.

I would like to conclude this preface with a word of gratitude. The generosity of the Faculty Publishing Fund and the University of Richmond for their support of this book.
Preface

For a long time I wondered who or what was meant by Gratt., Hen. & M., Gilm., and the other references to the older Virginia legal authorities. A cursory investigation revealed that the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century law reporters, whose reports bear their own names, include in their number men of the highest political and legal visibility, such as Thomas Jefferson and George Wythe, as well as persons who are very little known. My curiosity having been aroused, I organized this series of biographical sketches of the Virginia law reporters whose publications are cited by their own names, according to the older custom. This volume brings together through their common interest in law reporting a colonial attorney general, the first law professor in America, a president of the United States, a United States attorney general, a United States Supreme Court justice, many Virginia and federal politicians, Virginia judges, legal scholars, court clerks, a preacher, and a poet. These sketches are arranged according to the order of the official series of Virginia Reports with those of the compilers of the miscellaneous reports following in chronological order.

I would like to conclude this preface by acknowledging the generosity of the Faculty Publications Committee of the University of Richmond for their financial support of this book.
