Law Library News

The semester is nearly complete, but there are two remaining hurdles: exams and final papers. The entire law library team supports student success, and carrels, tables, and shared spaces are where many of you toil to make this happen. We're now in the 24-hour access period, so you can study as late and as early as you need. As you do, please be mindful of fellow students, including undergraduates, here in our shared space. We all wish you well in the remaining days of the term.

- Roger Skalbeck, Associate Dean

For any questions please ask at the circulation desk during regular business hours.

Undergraduates in the Library

You may notice some unfamiliar faces in the library during study and exam period. All libraries at the University of Richmond, including the Muse Law Library, are open to every University of Richmond student. If a non-law student is using your carrel or being loud, please notify a librarian or the circulation desk and we'll be happy to address the issue.

and new features, including a streamlined interface that makes it easier to navigate long statutes and cases, a tool that provides comparisons/redlines between versions of a statute, and a new orange flag that informs you that your case may rely on a line of cases that might no longer be good law.

Goodbye FDSys, hello Govinfo.gov

If you've been using FDSys to access the CFR, Federal Register, or other federal primary legal sources, please note that it's being replaced with govinfo.gov effective December 14. Govinfo has the same materials with a much improved and more modern user interface.
