three intervals

three intervals // Megan Towey interval cedar almost having pulled the pink from the blush, we cradle a language of pauses

a sky embedded in one small of a back for minutes, causing substance in slow hours where I eliminate the progress of unfolding in buildings I should've been evacuated from a trace of semicolon the undersides of moon magnolia never having known loneliness, never having seen a pattern-dull ocean structure we will be in a singular passage as I slip questioning beneath rivers beneath stairwells almost having held compassion in my toy arms. my body coated in my terms interval multiform

here wrenching silence where rhythm should have lifted your rectangular heels from the floor. here pitfalling absence where there should have been flat hands brushing back your curls captured in conducted sunlight we fall into a hunting season: all misfire & misled forms, all earth, all soil;

feeling one's cleared-out soul as a deadly cycad named for its process of sourcing nutrient in cyanide

(I have not yet determined if you have changed for certain my dear thick cluster of thin thoughts my presumption in having known what the ancients thought my sky bloated with astronauts) no sensorium I engage any info;

I had to suffer to learn that to suffer is meaningless & then again to unlearn that to unspill the carbon from the lifeform

safe interval

but yeah, I wanted it.
where I went

I couldn't inhabit
my body. my form,
locked up in its absence.
my shotgun empathy hovering in the space between, scorching form to find it in the little blast of an eye staying open I swirl, a deep blue box for I am human, efficiently. sunburn condenses on the pale green lifecycle of my back in intervals all straight lines all digital prophets did you know that even secret names can compose a poem?

I dreamt a new name for you in unstable colors, wanting to have done a thing properly it swings in the cool grey sky of your mouth

I know the frantic cubes of memory induce anxiety and that's okay
