Suicide Watch

Micah Farmer
He always liked to light the matches.
To feel the flare as the flame took over.
The fear when it crept too close to fragile fingers and the last minute twist for extinguished safety. Fact: there’s only so much friction a lively hand can handle before the hand is scorched. Even nursery pastel walls lose their vibrancy when the babies toddle out. The sound that crayons make when they scar the pages always warped his wrist and he’d rub it to soothe the ache.

We come from bunk beds.
We come from sweaty summer fans oscillating the putrid air in swirls of primary reds and yellows.
We fail to see the gradual shift from summer greens to autumn decay.
We fail to see the chromatic chickadee contemplating God, but we whistle along in the startling quiet like a prayer.
Where did these notes come from and when did they scribble verdicts?
Because the Lord knows, we don't know the words for this world and the world pretends to give a speech, pretends martyrdom when it points a finger upward in contempt.
He can’t stay static so we stuff his face with pills, hoping he’ll just pay attention and regurgitate the lecture we just critiqued.
Everybody’s afraid of the book, afraid to turn the pages, because they’re afraid they might get an answer.
